I would like to see the Committee on Agriculture bring in a bill that would open the doors of the cold-storage plants of this country. [Applause.] I would like to see legislation passed that would open the cold-storage plants, which now have on hand a great supply of our foodstuffs and which are for their own selfish purposes daily and weekly gathering in additional supplies which ought to be turned loose, so that the people of this country may have it to eat. I would rather see the Committee on Agriculture bring in a bill that would undertake to control and wipe out gambling in farm products and prevent such a situation as occurred in Chicago a week or two ago, when the price of wheat was increased to an enormous extent, to the great detriment and positive distress of the people of the country, and without benefit to the wheat grower, who long ago parted with his product. [Applause.]

I would like to see the committee bring in a bill which would break up the conspiracies which have been formed for the boosting of food prices and put the conspirators where they belong. I would like for the committee to report a bill such as has been proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] to prevent the slaughtering of very young calves. The passage of bills like these would, in my judgment, do vastly more to afford real relief in the present crisis, and their enforcement would not cost the people $14,000,000, as the present bill will do.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the employment of several thousand experts in addition to those now employed will serve any good purpose or benefit the farmer in his work in any way. I do not question the value of those now in the field, but this additional army, at salaries ranging up to $2,500 a year, could be better employed helping to actually produce the foodstuffs on the farm or in some other employment, taking the places of those who go to war, if they are not to go themselves. I believe in the campaign of education and demonstration, but I do not believe the present emergency should be taken advantage of to create so many thousand jobs at the expense of the people. I voted to strike this paragraph out in committee, and I hope I may have an opportunity to again vote to eliminate it before the bill is put on final passage. There are one or two provisions in this bill which have my approval. One is the provision providing for a food survey. I think it important to know just how much food there is in the country and where it is. We ought to know, so that those speculators who are hoarding food for higher prices may be reached, and also that we may see to it that our people are not deprived of all their food by its shipment out of the country. Another provision is the one relating to a reserve seed supply. I have received a number of letters complaining of the inability to get seed at reasonable prices.

This provision, I hope, will make such a condition impossible next year by enabling the farmer to get his seed at reasonable and proper cost.

I am aware that this bill does not legislate on food control, although as first brought in it winked very strongly at it. But, for the benefit of the members of the Agricultural Committee, which is now considering a food-control bill, and of the membership of the House, I want to ask the Clerk to read this letter from Col. A. M. Shook, of Nashville, one of the most prominent and successful citizens of the State and the South.

NASHVILLE, TENN., May 25, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BYRNS: The question of "food control" in this country is more than a man's job. You can no more regulate the price of food without simultaneously regulating the prices of all materials that enter into the cost of production than you can regulate the ebb and flow of the tides without regulating the earth's revolutions, and also regulating the movements of all the other planets that surround it, and hold it in its orbit.

Three-dollar wheat and 30-cent cotton are not higher than $45 pig iron. You can no more raise wheat and cotton without the products of pig iron than you can make pig iron without fuel. In normal times $1 for wheat, 10 cents for cotton, and $15 for pig iron are regarded as good prices. The cost of all these commodities is largely based on the cost of labor. If the labor cost is increased 100 per cent by reason of the increased cost of living, certainly the laborer is entitled to 100 per cent advance. If the cost of tools and implements has increased 300 per cent by reason of the increased cost of iron and steel, then the manufacturer is entitled to the increased cost imposed by the higher prices of labor, and also to the additional increased cost imposed by higher prices for tools and implements and increased taxes.

Because pig iron is selling at $45 per ton does not mean that the manufacturer is making $30 per ton more profit than he did when pig iron was selling at $15 per ton. All of the materials that enter into the cost of pig iron have advanced. The normal price of coke, when pig iron was selling at $15 per ton, was $2.50 per ton. To-day coke is selling at from $10 to $12 per ton, and while the prices of finished iron and steel are higher than ever known, it does not follow that the advance between the selling price of to-day and the selling price of five years ago is all profit and goes into the pockets of the manufacturer.

Therefore you can not regulate the price of any product without going back to the ground and regulating the prices of labor and raw materials that enter into the product. For this reason you can not control by legislation the prices of food products without at the same time controlling the prices of all labor and materials that enter into the cost of production.

Yours, very truly,

A. M. SHOOK.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I propose to vote for a motion to recommit this bill, and if that vote shall fail I shall vote for this bill, and it occurs to me that in voting for the bill one really ought to give some sort of an excuse for so doing. I am proposing to give my excuse. First, I would like to incorporate in my remarks the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX]. I agree largely with what he said.

I have still other reasons for voting for the bill than the reasons he gave. It is my purpose to go just as far as I can without violating what I consider important and fundamental principles in meeting the views and desires of the administration, and I vote for this bill, not because I feel overhopeful of the good it will accomplish but because I feel that the worst that can be said of it is that it will not be specially helpful and that some of the moneys we propose to appropriate at least may be extravagantly and wastefully expended. In a time like this we can not hope that all of our appropriations will be expended with that care and with that economy that ought to characterize governmental expenses always, and that do to a certain extent characterize them in times of peace.

There are other measures proposed and to follow this from the same committee for which I can not vote, as I view the matter now. I at least want to be in the position of saying that I went as far as I possibly could in meeting the views of the administration and of the Secretary of Agriculture relative to the encouragement of the growth of food products, relative to their conservation, in order that when we are asked to do something that is revolutionary and that, in my opinion, would be infinitely harmful, I can be in the position of having gone as far as in good conscience I can go.

While I shall therefore vote for this bill, I am not expecting very much benefit out of section 3 of the bill—this food survey—because I realize that by the time the agents of the department get into the field the spring-wheat crop will be in harvest, and in a short time almost the entire spring-wheat crop will be added to the Nation's food supply, and the department will have to change its figures every day in order to keep pace with that increase of supply. Following that will come the winter-wheat harvest, and then again the department figures will have to be changed in order to meet the new condition, in order to set forth the supply as increased by the winter-wheat crop. In the meantime the potato crop is coming on, and the barley crop which we are going to use for other purposes than the Milwaukee purpose, it is hoped, this coming year. [Laughter.] The rye crop and all these other sources of food supply will follow, so that I doubt whether we will get very much valuable information by the food survey we would not have or secure otherwise. But we will at least accomplish this: We will give the Department of Agriculture something to do. [Laughter.] The gentlemen up there will have something else to do besides speculating upon the shortage of food. They will be so busy trying to find out how much we have that they will cease frightening us all by their dire prophecies of a shortage of food. [Applause.]

I am one of those who believe that the apparent shortage, as indicated by the high prices, is due to a considerable extent to the constant and sensational statements from official and unofficial sources as to shortages of foodstuffs now grown and growing. The farmers may be depended upon to raise all they can, in view of the high prices prevailing and likely to prevail, and if we do not hamper them and interfere with their operations or scare them as to price they will produce a great quantity of produce. I hope this bill will help and not hinder in that good work. I hope at least some good will come of it, and therefore I vote for it, though I do feel very enthusiastic as to some of its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I shall offer an amendment on page 7, lines 7 and 8, commencing with the word "including," in line 7, as follows: "Including the payment of such rent." I suppose it will be defeated. The reason why I offer this amendment is that if there is anything that any department desires or any bureau desires it is more room. Have you run to these departments much? I have been compelled to, because I must answer queries made by my constituents. I say frankly to them that the whole service is civil service, and that portion of it which is not under civil-service law I am not entitled to be heard upon, and if I sought to be heard I would be turned down, with which I have no quarrel. But I wish you would go down and look at this new Department of the Interior Building, and go up and examine where the General Land Office has its abiding place, and then go up and examine where the Geological Survey had its abiding place, with the furniture and so on, and travel all around to all the new buildings that are rented in the District, many of them magnificent buildings. I am not here to say that all of them are unnecessary. But if there is anything that is needed, if we listen to the employees at the head of the bureaus, it is more room, more room, more room. In a hearing before the Committee on Appropriations, when more room was urgently requested, I called the attention of a Cabinet officer to the fact that from Fourteenth Street up to the White Lot, east and west, and from Pennsylvania Avenue down to the Monument Grounds, covering probably somewhere from 20 to 30 acres, the land was all covered by buildings owned by the Government and substantially all unoccupied, and that which is occupied is at a nominal rent, I understand, from month to month. It was said it would be looked into, but so far as I know and believe it has not been looked into. There is plenty of room now for the purposes of this bill if they will utilize it, and there is no trouble about getting the authority to utilize it. Years ago this Congress enacted a law that it would be unlawful for any department to lease buildings unless specially authorized. Here comes the chairman of the committee saying, I believe, that 4,500 new employees—and the gentleman at the head of the minority saying 7,500 employees—are provided for by this bill. The Agricultural Department is authorized to rent and to utilize this amount of money. This information can be gathered better without any man going away from the Capital; gathered by telegraph, by reports, and I will state again, as I said once before, that they know accurately now more than six months' investigation, going from neighborhood to neighborhood, would tell them about how much there is of wheat and corn and cattle and products in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. This bill ought to be recommitted. I will vote to recommit it if somebody will make the motion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more. I want to ask him a question or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] touched on a subject that I have studied about a good deal, and that is, Why do they not go on and build these buildings that are needed? The ground on the southeast corner of Lafayette Square, between Pennsylvania Avenue and the Belasco Theater, was purchased when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was Speaker, or before that, for the purpose of building a Department of Justice building. Now, why do they not build it?

Mr. CANNON. Search me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The land which the gentleman mentioned, down by the Sherman Statue, was condemned five or six or seven years ago.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To build a State Department and some other department building.

Mr. CANNON. Department of Justice.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Have any steps ever been taken to build those buildings?

Mr. CANNON. I understand plans were made at one time, but they have not been adopted, so far as I know.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman another question. He has been here a long time. Does he not think it would be a saving to the Government and a wise performance for the United States Government to build every building in this town that it needs for its own business as soon as it can? [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I made an investigation once about the room occupied by the State Department, the whole southern wing of the War, State, and Navy Building. I found then, when we wanted a place to put the official records of the war, that the whole south wing of the War, State, and Navy Building was devoted to the State Department, and that, including clerks, officials, messengers, and watchmen, there were but 51 employees housed in that wing, and it cost $10,000 to house every employee. Well, now, there was a remedy provided, and by legislation put a force from the War Department in charge of the official records in that south wing of the building with the records, and after that we did not have to wait three or four years before you could get a report from the War Department as to the services of men in the Civil War.

Now, here is the trouble about it: There is a disposition on the part of architects, or somebody in charge—and I am not abusing the gentleman's party or abusing my own—to put in ornamentation and architecture and that kind of thing, which does not add to the housing of an office force. I think the new building recently rented for the Department of Justice at the corner of K Street and Vermont Avenue is the best office building that I know anything about. I presume there are others equally good. Now, the Government ought to build practical office buildings and dispense with architectural and unnecessary ornamental decoration in its buildings for clerical work.

Mr. SIMS. What are you going to do with the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Can the gentleman tell us whether the Government, which owns a good deal of valuable real estate that it has rented to other people, is getting anything like a fair market value return on the property from the rental it receives?

Mr. CANNON. What does the gentleman mean by fair market value?

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Government owns the property where the Poli Theater is, I think.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. And that hotel building there, and clear down to the Monument Grounds.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What percentage on its investment is the Government receiving on its property that it rents? I do not say anything about the property that is vacant year after year, like the ground south of the Belasco Theater; but for that which is rented, is the Government receiving a fair return on its investment?

Mr. CANNON. We are, I suppose, receiving a small rental for a few of those buildings owned by the Government. But the Government can build practical office buildings.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And economical buildings.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; fairly economical, and do much better.

But for the purposes of this bill, instead of authorizing the renting of buildings out of this appropriation of $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 I say, measuring my words, that it is my judgment that all the new employees authorized by this bill could be housed in the vacant buildings that the Government now owns. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, and will offer no apology for doing so. I am going to vote for it because I believe it provides remedies for existing conditions that will be of great value to the American people. It is somewhat unfortunate that some of the arguments which I have listened to here to-day were made. I would not vote for this bill or any other measure if I thought, as stated by one gentleman, that it merely authorized some one to put his hands into a depleted Treasury and abstract money with which to buy automobiles and finance joy rides. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman who uttered that language spoke with his usual deliberation. Of all the departments of the Government, I do not believe there is one—unless it is the Post Office Department, possibly—which responds more freely to the great necessities of the American people than the Department of Agriculture. I do not believe that the present management or any management that I ever knew—and I have served here when that great department was administered by a great citizen of the State represented by one member of the Agricultural Committee—I do not believe that any man who ever administered the affairs of that great department would deliberately put his hands into the Federal Treasury and take out and expend money idly, uselessly, and wantonly for automobile joy rides.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman would not have them walk around the country, would he; he would have them ride?

Mr. RUCKER. No; I would have them ride.

Mr. HAUGEN. They are using automobiles now.

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly; and I am in favor of their using them. The gentleman named the Ford, which, I think, is the best machine on the market; and I am not selling them, either. [Laughter and applause.]

When you come to the man who produces the stuff that feeds the Nation, we find so many farmers in Congress, expert farmers, that have farms of their own, and so many have spoken of their broad acres and their close relation to the soil that I would feel embarrassed if I did not confess also that I have a farm. [Applause.]

Now, having made this gratifying confession, let me make the further suggestion that most of these political farmers who exhaust their entire energies in seeking election to Congress, just as I do, spend most of their salaries to keep the farm going. [Laughter.] It is for that reason that we want to extend assistance to the honest yeomanry of the country, to the men who actually farm, and not the men who farm the farmers, with an earnest desire and purpose to help the man who actually produces in the hope that he may learn to produce two bushels of corn where he now produces one. If we can do that, even Members of Congress can make their farms self-sustaining and have their salaries left to spend in the pursuit of pleasure while they joy ride in magnificent Ford machines. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill may not do all that gentlemen hoped for. It may not accomplish as much as individuals want, but it is a step in the right direction, and I bid Godspeed to the chairman and members of this great committee and to the great Agricultural Department in their efforts to do these things which are so much demanded and so sorely needed by the great American people. I will vote for the bill and will vote for every such bill which has the support of the Agriculture Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply interested not only in this bill but in any bills that are going to aid the farmer. I have in my hand the bulletin issued by the New York State Food Supply Commission for patriotic agricultural service. I understand that we will not spend a dollar for salaries to anyone in carrying out the plan of our New York association. I am not going to take up a great deal of time trying to read the entire bulletin, but I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD so that it will be available for all of you.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman state how many pages there are in the bulletin.

Mr. WALDOW. Three or four. Now, gentlemen, I merely want to state that at the present time we have an organization that is perfected, and they are doing real work. A survey has been made through the school district and the survey has not cost a cent of money. An increased production of acreage, in other words, the amount of land the farmer has plowed for the year 1917 in excess of 1916, is large. We will plow over 60,000 more acres for potatoes this year than we did last. We have plowed 148,000 more acres for corn and 200,000 more acres for oats, 16,000 more acres for barley, and in that way in almost every line we have increased our production. I am not going to find fault with the committee in bringing in this bill. I believe it may do some good, and I am going to vote for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Upon instructions from the commissioner of education, the district superintendents of schools, teachers, and agricultural pupils were enlisted to make this survey. The survey includes questions designed to find out what the farmer needs in the way of farm labor, seeds, fertilizers, machinery, etc., and to determine the exact crop outlook for 1917 as compared with 1916. Farmers were asked to give their proposed acreage of various crops in 1917 as compared with 1916; also the number of animals kept in these two years.

The commission has undertaken to mobilize, and to make available to farmers, all the farm boys of the State who have had farm experience, and who are therefore capable of doing efficient work on the farms.

Mr. WALDOW. We have a farm-loan fund that lives up to its name. It loans money to the farmers.

We have taken up the matter of transportation not only for our crops but for immediate transporting of seed, farm implements, and other necessities used for the planting of crops.

We have taken an inventory of all available seed, and are ready to distribute them wherever they are needed. This next section is very important:

In order to safeguard the interests of farmers who respond to the appeal to increase their production of farm products and to protect them against possible loss, the commission has expressed itself as favoring action by the National Government looking toward guarantees for the farmer against financial loss resulting from overproduction of staple crops.

I sincerely hope the chairman will embody in some bill that is presented to this Congress—and I will vote for almost any amount of money—that which will protect and assure the farmer of a fair profit for these immense crops we are asking him to raise.

We have asked the farmer to work harder and more hours, if that is possible. We have voted millions of dollars for this, that, and God knows what not. But up to the present very little, if any, assurance has been given to the farmer that he will be able to find a market for his products that will give him a fair profit on his labor.

Another very important part of the commission's plan includes a systematic effort to lower the cost of distribution of food products from the producer to the consumer, with the view of protecting farmers and the general public against the present high cost of marketing farm products, in the hope that the producers may secure a larger return without increasing the cost to consumers.

Gentlemen, if our governor, the Hon. Charles S. Whitman, can carry out to a successful end the ideas he has expressed in that last paragraph, his name will live in history as the greatest public servant the State of New York has ever had.

I sincerely hope the Department of Justice will make a special effort to stop all food speculation.

THE AGRICULTURAL CENSUS.

In a preliminary report submitted to Gov. Whitman on May 3 the New York State Food Supply Commission showed an increase in the acreage of grain crops in New York State of from 20 to 25 per cent in comparison with last year's acreage. The figures from 52 counties of the State and covering 189,602 farms indicate this result. The increase in acreage is one which the commission regards as most creditable to the farmers of the State.

The first step taken by the commission was a census of the agricultural resources of the State. Great care was taken by those in charge of the census to insure accuracy, so the commission would be in possession of information showing the crop prospects for this year.

An increase of 67,000 acres of potatoes over the acreage of last year is shown by the report. Last year the acreage reported in 52 counties was 284,364, while this year the farmers in the same counties will plant 351,091 acres of potatoes. This is an increase of 20 per cent.

An increase of nearly 50 per cent in the acreage to be devoted to corn for grain is another result which shows the commission the State is responding to the call for increased production. The census report shows 301,622 acres of corn in 1916. For this year it shows a corn acreage of 449,704, the increase being 148,082 acres.

In oats the total acreage in the 52 counties covered last year was 1,051,180. This year the census gives 1,203,636 acres to be planted in oats.

The report shows an increase of 16,000 acres over the barley acreage of 89,598 of last year, and one of 40,095 acres over the buckwheat acreage of last year of 252,400.

The spring-wheat acreage is another which shows a big advance. Last year the spring-wheat acreage was 11,626. This year 31,225 acres will be planted. Winter wheat shows an increase of 40,000 acres over the 315,393 acres of 1916.

Field beans show an increase of 80,000 over the 182,707 acres of last year, and alfalfa an increase of 18,000 acres over 150,360 acres of last year.

In other hay a decrease of 100,000 acres is shown. In the counties covered the census showed a total of 3,740,495 acres of hay this year, with 3,867,534 in hay last year. This indicates that land devoted to hay last year is to be given over to other crops this year, causing a shrinkage in the hay acreage.

The cabbage acreage shows an increase of about 80 per cent and 26,000 acres. The total for 1916 was 32,250 acres. Members of the commission pointed out that cabbage is a perishable product and that there might not be a great advantage in increasing so greatly cabbage production.

A substantial increase in canning-factory crops is shown by the census, the acreage last year being 41,507, the increase this year being 12,871 acres.

The census in the remaining 10 counties will be finished within a short time, so that the figures will be available on the total acreage in the State.

The commission is obtaining other figures through the census to aid in carrying out its plans to increase production.

THE COMMISSION WILL OPERATE FARM TRACTORS.

At its weekly meeting on May 4 the New York State Food Supply Commission purchased 22 tractors for farm use and took options on 40 additional machines, which will be distributed through the State in accordance with regulations.

If we had a few more States as well organized as New York State, there would be no necessity of having a Mr. Hoover.

I am afraid Mr. Hoover is comparing this vast country of ours, with its unlimited resources, to that little dot of land in the North Sea. The people of England have never been able to free themselves from the fear of famine, even in times of peace.

I doubt if the passage of this bill will assist the farmer to any great extent this coming year. We in New York State have been organized and have had our organization in working order for over a month.

By the time this bill becomes a law, if it does become a law, the planting season in the greater portion of our country will be over.

I am not in favor of the employment of an army of men, paying them fancy salaries, when they could be of real benefit tilling the soil. However, there is a possibility of some sections of our country receiving a benefit by the passage of this act, and I am going to take a chance, believing it may do some good, and vote for it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee for a moment, I desire to direct attention to the fact that in a few moments we will be called upon to vote yea or nay on this bill. I have listened for three days to criticisms directed at this possible legislation. That criticism has come from those who do not feel that there is any necessity for the American people to awaken to the fact that some kind of control of the food situation is absolutely necessary.

I am not an alarmist, but facts have been presented to the Committee on Agriculture—some of them in executive session—by men who ought to know, that have convinced me at least, and, I think, a large majority of the Committee on Agriculture, that it is absolutely necessary, if we are to feed our own people and our allies, to look to the conservation of the food supply of this Nation.

I want to direct the attention of gentlemen to another fact. The heavy artillery of the so-called economists lumbered into action this afternoon. The cry of economy has gone up on this small bit of legislation, carrying, in comparison with other legislation, an insignificant appropriation, which has not gone up on any bill that has been presented to this Congress at this session. We are proposing to expend, in round numbers, $9,000,000, through the agencies of the Department of Agriculture, to stimulate production and conserve the food resources of this Nation. We are proposing to expend, in round numbers, $6,000,000 to insure a reasonable seed supply for the next crop year, and yet the cry of economy has been raised here—economy on this little bill carrying an appropriation of less than $15,000,000. It is not economy that these gentlemen desire to effect that accounts for the opposition to the bill. It may be that the opposition can be accounted for because we are carrying power in the bill to go into the storage concerns and find out who is hoarding and who is speculating. [Applause.]

Oh, gentlemen cry economy. On an appropriation bill carrying a lump sum, in round numbers, of about $3,000,000,000 there was not a peep, not a chirp, not a cry of economy raised by these gentlemen who are now raising that cry upon this little bill. Let us be consistent. We are trying here to produce something. We are making an investment which, in my judgment, will bring a return of 100 per cent upon every dollar invested, and yet they cry economy! That is not the fear. Do not be deceived. They say that we ought to hit the speculator and the cold-storage people and the liquor people. Wait until we get the other food bill and see if we have not done that, but do not throttle this bill here because somebody may be afraid that through the powers conferred in it we are going to get information that may put somebody in the penitentiary. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Such part, not exceeding 20 per cent of any of the foregoing sums as the Secretary of Agriculture may find not to be required for carrying out the purposes of the particular item for which specifically appropriated may, by his order, from time to time, be transferred to any other such item or items, or may be otherwise used for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the payment of such rent, the expense of such printing and publications, and the employment of such agencies in the Department of Agriculture, such persons, and such means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, there is a committee amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 1, after the word "centum," insert the words "of the total."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. He talks about some one who is opposing this bill, trying to protect somebody else. Mr. Chairman, so far as the remarks apply to me, the gentleman, speaking mildly, is mistaken. I voted for the passage of the deficiency bill, yes, carrying, as it did, a large amount of money. The Senate has added a large amount to it, and it is still pending and, I presume, will be considered, perchance, this afternoon. It carries large sums; yes. We are speaking now in millions and in billions. Ah, but there comes on measures like this, to be followed by worse measures from the gentleman's committee in a day or two or in a few days. Oh, this is a good time to hitch on this thing. When the money is spent and the knowledge is gathered it will be useless. It provides for employees—yes; by the thousands—which they are seeking to fasten upon the Treasury of the United States in this war time, hoping to get by without its being observed. I speak respectfully of the gentleman's committee and not disrespectfully of any member of it, and I speak respectfully of the Agricultural Department, but there is in the RECORD within the last week enough to show how it was one thing a week ago and another thing now, from the head of the department down—seeking to fasten upon the Republic in this great struggle an expenditure of $14,000,000 that might be overlooked with the billions that are necessary to appropriate for the real defense of the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the amendment before the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is here with a great conference report, and he desires to go on this afternoon. I had a tentative agreement with him that he might do so.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, and I will ask the chairman of the committee whether he has any objection to it. I propose to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman that I do not object to it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Then why take any time to discuss it?

Mr. LEVER. Let the gentleman offer his amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment pending now, is there not?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota offers the following amendment: Page 7, strike out lines 1 to 12, both inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I think I was recognized by the Chair originally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota would be entitled to recognition.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me say to gentlemen that if they desire to make any statements, they make them on something that is pending and pertinent. The committee is going to accept this amendment. Their statements may come on the next section.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman give time to these gentlemen at that time?

Mr. LEVER. I will try to be reasonable about the matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to speak for five minutes upon this paragraph.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest that the gentleman get time on the next paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LAGUARDIA offers the following amendment: Page 6, at the end of line 24, strike out the period and insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, That the appointment of inspectors, agents, experts, clerks, and employees by the Secretary of Agriculture as authorized in this act"——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have already passed this.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be heard upon this. I do not believe this ought to be steam rollered over in this manner.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than one year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Mr. REAVIS, Mr. LAGUARDIA, and Mr. YOUNG of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is a member of the committee and is entitled to recognition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I inquire if the gentleman from Texas is going to make a regular motion or just a pro forma motion?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I am going to make a very important proposition here.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will make a pro forma amendment, then.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I make a motion to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LEVER. Then I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close now. [Applause.]

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused.

So the motion to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as an extra paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: At end of bill insert:

"Provided, That the appointment of inspectors, agents, experts, clerks, and employees by the Secretary of Agriculture as authorized in this act shall be in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883."

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Awhile ago I asked if I would be recognized to make a motion and the Chair said I would. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] stated that I would have time to speak upon that motion. I merely ask whether I will have an opportunity now in view of these agreements to make a motion and speak on it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I am sure, appreciates the situation that finally came up. The Chair meant to keep his word to the gentleman but the committee by almost unanimous vote moved to close all debate.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I had had recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been sustained and all debate is closed. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is recognized.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling on the proposition.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEVER. Upon that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered,

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, upon that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, and on that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-nine gentlemen have risen in the affirmative; not a sufficient number.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-three gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. KEATING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. If the Chair ascertains there is not a quorum present, will the vote come on the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. KEATING. Having asked for the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays having been refused?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, but the gentleman from Iowa raised the point of no quorum.

Mr. KEATING. That was after the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds there was no quorum, and the House was dividing.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, when it was announced that 29 gentlemen had risen, not a sufficient number, the other side, just as that was announced, or just before, was asked for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard anybody ask for that.

Mr. CANNON. I asked it myself, and somebody else asked for it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; I asked for it.

Mr. CANNON. And then the point of no quorum was raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have recognized the gentleman if he had heard it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, was the question put to a vote? It seems to me as the Chair stated the question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] rose and demanded the yeas and nays before the vote was taken, so that the House was not dividing.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing, and then the Speaker counted one side, and the yeas and nays were demanded, and they did not get enough for the yeas and nays, and the Chair did not hear anybody demand the other side.

Mr. CANNON. I demanded it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was not on the motion to recommit, but on the motion to close debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair started to put the motion to recommit and counted one side, and then the point of order that no quorum was present was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, as I remember, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] moved the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. LEVER. No; on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. That question was put——

Mr. LEVER. Yes; put and carried.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And then the Speaker stated that the qusetion now recurred on the motion to recommit, and on that, before a vote was taken, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] demanded the yeas and nays. I think that is according to the record. That was before the House divided.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll on the motion to recommit. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion will answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 81, nays 222, answered "present" 6, not voting 120, as follows:

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with my colleague, Mr. COOPER of West Virginia. I do not know how he would vote if here. I voted no. Out of respect to my pair I want to withdraw my negative vote and to answer present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-five Members; not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it and the bill is passed. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to extend remarks on the bill just passed to Mr. COX, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. FESS, Mr. FARR, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. KEATING, Mr. ROSE, Mr. BROWNE, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. TIMBERLAKE, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, Mr. KINKAID, Mr. FOCHT, Mr. FAIRFIELD, Mr. MILLER of Minnesota, Mr. BACON, Mr. DILL, Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee, and Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the speech delivered by Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN, our colleague from Texas, on the Elements of universal peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, on account of war expenses, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, to nonconcur in all the Senate amendments excepting Senate amendment No. 2, and to concur in Senate amendment No. 2 with an amendment, which I ask to have reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of H. R. 3971 with Senate amendments, and to disagree to all the Senate amendments excepting Senate amendment No. 2, and to concur in that amendment with an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question in regard to Senate amendment No. 27, on page 39 of the printed bill. This amendment increases by $500,000 the appropriation made by the House for such purposes at Army and mobilization camps as post exchanges, schools, libraries, reading, lunch, and amusement rooms, gymnasia, and so forth. I do not desire to object to the request for a disagreement and reference to conference if we may be assured that this amendment will either be agreed to or that the House will have an opportunity to express itself upon it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Committee on Appropriations granted the full amount requested by the War Department for the purpose. If there be some reason for a greater sum, I am sure the managers on the part of the House desire to carry out the purpose. I can not say that the managers on the part of the House would agree to the amendment without information as to the reason for the increase. The War Department presented the reasons to the committee, which the committee believed made it desirable to provide suitable recreational facilities for those camps. Upon the statement made by the War Department the committee in the original bill incorporated the sum requested, and that would indicate that, so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, the committee believed it important and desirable to carry on the work. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be content with that statement.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from New York states that the War Department requested $150,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was the amount requested when the bill was before the committee.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am reliably informed that the War Department states that the $500,000 additional is the minimum that should be appropriated, and that the War Department is in favor of the Senate amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that be true it is an opinion that has been formed subsequently to the consideration of the bill in the House, and something must have occurred to justify the change of opinion. That opinion has not been transmitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The amendment was added in the Senate without objection and with the approval of the War Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be, and if it be demonstrated that the additional sum is necessary I am in favor of adding it. My recollection is that the amount requested by the War Department is the amount passed by the House.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman's attitude be to give the House a chance to vote on the amendment if the conferees do not agree to the Senate amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not say as to that. All I can say is this, that if there were no reason for the increase and the managers on the part of the two Houses were able to make a complete agreement without agreeing to that amendment, I do not believe we would be justified in holding up this appropriation bill carrying more than $3,000,000,000 in view of the fact that expenditures are being made without authority and that the passing of this bill is very much needed. All I can say is, that as far as I know, all of the members of the Committee on Appropriations were in sympathy with the purpose for which the money was asked and recommended that the department's request be complied with. I have no doubt that if it be shown that the sum is inadequate and that additional money is needed for the same purpose that those who naturally will be the conferees will be in favor of it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Here is an amendment of vital importance. It concerns the welfare of every soldier in training at the great Army camps established and to be established. It will make possible the creation of an environment which will be of vast benefit. These educational and recreational provisions will help to take the place of the restraining influences of home and home society at a time when powerful influences are pulling the other way. I feel that the House ought to have a chance to vote on the increased funds provided by the Senate inasmuch as anything less than that would not be sufficient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be true, but the War Department has not furnished the House of Representatives with any additional facts and the House has given every dollar that it requested. If there is additional information there ought to be an opportunity to consider it. I will say to the gentleman that there is no hostility to the provisions, but there might not be a justification for it. I imagine that what will be done will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from New York will give an indication that before it is decided adversely he will give the House a chance to vote on it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is equivalent to saying that if three Members representing the House think that this amount should not be increased the House managers will report a disagreement on this bill even if no other matter is involved, and I would not, in view of the importance of the bill, agree to do so.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to move to concur in the Senate amendment? If it is the proper time, I desire to make a motion to that effect.

The SPEAKER. If the request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from New York is granted, there is only one amendment in controversy, and that is amendment No. 2.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I desire to move to concur in amendment No. 27 at the proper time.

Mr. CANNON. The thing to do is to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and consider it in the House, disagree to the Senate amendments——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be content with the statement that I have made. I have no doubt that what will be done will be perfectly satisfactory. Personally, I believe that provision should be made for recreational facilities of a proper character for the camps. If the department presents good reasons why the additional sum should be given I have no doubt that it will be concurred in. I can not say that I shall agree to anything that the department requests, but if any reasonable request be made, if there is some complete plan showing that this amount is necessary, there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the chairman of the committee that this matter will be given consideration on the necessity shown by the War Department, and having confidence in his declaration of friendly attitude, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask that the unanimous request be again restated?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the Senate amendments to this bill, to disagree to all the Senate amendments except Senate amendment No. 2, and agree to that with an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, if that is granted, of course, there will be no discussion whatever, and I think before that unanimous consent is granted the gentleman from New York ought to state to the House the differences between the committee amendment to amendment No. 2 and the Senate amendment itself, so that we may have some information upon it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the committee from further consideration of the Senate amendments, nonconcur in all the Senate amendments except Senate amendment No. 2, and, if that be done, I shall then move to concur in Senate amendment No. 2 with an amendment and then make an explanation of that amendment.

I modify my request to that extent. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the Senate amendment, nonconcur in all the Senate amendments except No. 2, and agree to the conference asked for. If that request be granted, I shall then move to concur in that amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from further consideration of the Senate amendments, nonconcur in all the Senate amendments except No. 2, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman as to amendment No. 1, respecting the Council of National Defense, which proposes, as printed in the bill, an additional appropriation of $500,000, which, I take it, is in addition to the $200,000 already appropriated for the Council of National Defense. May I ask the gentleman whether this amendment contemplates any enlargement of the powers of the Council of National Defense?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the Senate amendment specifically provides that the existence of a state of war shall not be construed to enlarge the powers of the Council of National Defense.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So much has been said in the public print recently about the expenditure of $10,000,000,000 that I thought possibly the gentleman from New York might make some statement as to the attitude of the committee on that proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to make a statement regarding it if we can get this request granted. I do not know of any amendment that it is desired to offer to that provision, but I should be glad to make a statement in regard to it after we dispose of the other amendments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would make the statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I shall make that statement after we dispose of this amendment. I move to concur in Senate amendment No. 2, with an amendment to strike out the Senate amendment No. 2 and insert the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of Senate amendment No. 2 and insert:

"That the President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the amount herein authorized—

"(a) To order from any person such ships or material as he may determine to be necessary for the national defense and which are of the nature, kind, and quantity usually produced, or capable of being produced, by such person;

"(b) To modify, cancel, requisition, or suspend the performance of, any contract now in force or hereafter made for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material, or any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be utilized for shipbuilding;

"(c) To requisition the whole or any part of the output of any factory, or to take over and operate any factory or part thereof, that may be necessary for the purposes herein;

"(d) To purchase, requisition, and acquire the title and possession or use of any vessel of the United States, or of any vessel owned by a citizen of the United States, or by a corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, together with its equipment and stores; or any part of such vessel or charter thereof, or interest therein; or any charter to any such citizen or corporation of any vessel of any nationality; or to charter or direct the voyage and use of any vessel owned or chartered by any such citizen or corporation; such requisition, charter, or control, and the rates, terms, and conditions thereof, to be as the President shall direct;

"(e) To purchase, lease, or requisition, in fee or for a specified term, any dock, wharf, warehouse, or fueling, loading, discharging, terminal, or other facilities, or any part or equipment thereof or interest therein; to operate the same and to make any alterations or extensions thereof that may be necessary.

"Compliance with orders issued hereunder shall be obligatory, and the President may determine the priority to be given such orders in their execution. If any person to whom such order shall be given shall refuse or fail to comply therewith or to give the priority in its execution determined as herein provided, or to execute at such reasonable price as the President shall determine, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such person, or of such part thereof, as may be necessary for the execution of any such orders, and utilize the same in such manner as he may deem necessary.

"Whenever the President shall cancel, modify, suspend, requisition, or acquire any contract, or acquire, requisition, occupy, or make use of any factory or part thereof, or any material, or ship, charter, or space therein, or part thereof, or any dock, wharf, warehouse, or fueling, loading discharging, terminal, or other facilities, or equipment thereof, or order any ship or material as authorized herein the United States of America shall make just compensation therefor.

"The President shall ascertain in such summary manner as he may determine the compensation to be paid hereunder. If the person entitled to receive the same shall decline to accept the compensation so determined, he shall be paid from the sums herein or hereafter appropriated, within the amounts authorized herein, 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"To enable the President to purchase or otherwise to acquire ships now constructed or in the course of construction, and for every expenditure incident thereto, $150,000,000: Provided, That the President is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the same purposes not to exceed $100,000,000 in addition to the appropriation herein made.

"For the construction of ships, and for every expenditure incident thereto, $250,000,000 Provided, That the President is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise to incur obligations for the same purpose not to exceed $250,000,000 in addition to the appropriation herein made.

"If any ship, vessel, ship stores and equipment, contract, factory, charter, or interest therein be purchased, used, or acquired on behalf or for the benefit of the War or Navy Departments, the expenditure therefor shall only be from appropriations made for those departments and available for the purposes specified.

"For the operation of the ships herein authorized to be constructed, or in any other way acquired, except those acquired for the Army or Navy, and for every expenditure incident thereto, $5,000,000.

"No obligation shall be incurred for any of the purposes herein authorized, except for vessels acquired for the Army or Navy as hereinbefore provided, in excess of the amounts herein specifically authorized.

"The authority granted herein to the President may be exercised through such agency or agencies as he at any time shall determine.

"The word 'person,' as used herein, shall include any individual, trustee, firm, association, company, or corporation.

"The word 'ship' shall include any boat, vessel, or submarine and the parts thereof.

"The word 'material' shall include stores, supplies, and equipment for ships, and everything required for or in connection with the production thereof.

"The word 'factory' shall include any factory, workshop, engine works; buildings used for manufacture, assembling, construction, or any process; and any shipyard or dockyard.

"The words 'United States' shall include all land and water subject to the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States of America.

"All authority herein granted to the President shall terminate six months after a final treaty of peace is proclaimed between the United States and the Imperial German Government."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the provision in the Senate bill provides authority for the construction, purchase, or acquisition of approximately 3,000,000 tons of shipping in a period of 18 months. The proposed amendment which the House is asked to adopt is simply the rearranging the Senate amendment in more logical form and differs from it in four principal respects. First, it gives power to suspend contracts, as well as to cancel, modify, or requisition. In the Senate provision there was no authority to suspend a contract between private parties which might interfere with the Government requisitioning or requiring work to be done. In the next place, it makes provision for the requisitioning of docks, terminal facilities, fuel and storage facilities that may be necessary in the operation of ships acquired. In the third place, it eliminates a provision contained in the Senate amendment of the following character: The Senate provided that the money appropriated might be utilized to expedite the construction of ships on account of some other governmental agency or person than the United States.

The proposed amendment does not permit the appropriation to be utilized for the expedition of the construction of ships, except for ships that are to be requisitioned or taken over on account of the United States. The fourth proposition has to do with the authority of the President to delegate the powers conferred by the provision. This proposed legislation is of a most radical and unique character.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is stating the omissions or things included in the Senate amendment that are not included in this? The Senate amendment gives authority to the President to operate these ships, but I do not find any such authority in the committee amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the intention is to give it to the President, and I shall discuss that in a moment. A question has been raised as to whether this amendment does confer that authority, and the understanding is that if upon closer examination that authority be not conferred, it can be perfected in conference, because one provision has been stricken out and it is proposed to insert another. This legislation is of a very radical, unique, and unusual character. It confers the most comprehensive powers ever proposed upon the President of the United States. It authorizes him to, requisition the entire output of a factory, a portion of a factory, to take over ships, to cancel contracts, to assume contracts, to suspend contracts, to operate the ships; and when the powers given here are exercised, provision is made to make just compensation for the taking over. Authority is given to the President to ascertain in a summary manner what the just compensation shall be, and if that compensation so determined shall not be satisfactory to the person affected then he shall be paid 75 per cent of that sum and given a right to proceed against the United States in the Court of Claims to recover such additional sum as will make just compensation. Under the Senate amendment the President is authorized to delegate all of those powers of a radical and comprehensive character to the general manager of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation. That is a corporation organized by the Shipping Board under the authority conferred by the shipping act for the purpose of having constructed ships deemed essential at this time.

The general manager of that corporation is Maj. Gen. Goethals, who was selected by the Shipping Board to take control of the construction of these ships, and the intention of the Senate was to express its desire that as full power as possible should be given to Gen. Goethals. It appeared at once, however, that it would be a most extraordinary legislative act for the Congress to provide that these unique, radical, and comprehensive powers might be delegated to an officer of a private corporation, and could not be granted to anyone else, so the Committee on Appropriations has modified that provision so as to devolve all the power upon the President and authorizes him to exercise them through such agency or agencies and at such times as he shall determine to be advisable.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was the committee in any way actuated by any controversy now existing between the Shipping Board and Maj. Gen. Goethals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all; and I shall discuss that a little later.

This proposal, so far as I am informed, is satisfactory not only to the Shipping Board but satisfactory to Gen. Goethals. He did not wish to have those extraordinary powers conferred upon him for the requisitioning of various utilities for the operation of ships. The Shipping Board was confronted with a necessity that arose of making some practical suggestions to acquire within the next 18 months about 3,000,000 tons of shipping. A suggestion was made to the board that that amount of shipping could be obtained within that period by adverting to wooden ships and having constructed wooden ships of about 3,000 tons. After somewhat hasty consideration, it was first thought that that was feasible. The Shipping Board organized this corporation, and then sent for Gen. Goethals and told him of the necessity for the work, the emergency of the situation, and requested him to accept the presidency of this corporation and to undertake the work. After some negotiation he acquiesced in the request to take control of the work, but requested to be made the general manager of the corporation and the chairman of its executive committee.

The Shipping Board informed him that it would make him the general manager of the corporation and also make him the executive committee without any other members, so that there would be centered in him full responsibility and power to do what was proposed. He immediately took up the question of how these ships could be acquired. He reached the conclusion that it was not possible to build 3,000,000 tons of wooden ships in 18 months, and as the result of an experience he had had in the construction of the Panama Canal, he concluded that steel ships could be turned out much more rapidly than was then contemplated or believed possible. He recalled that the gates for the locks of the Panama Canal were pontoons. They had been fabricated in the United States, shipped to the canal, and erected there; and it occurred to him that if a standardized ship were designed that they could be fabricated in the steel mills in the various parts of the country, the parts shipped to tidewater, and there assembled, in the same way that the gates of the lock were put together at the Panama Canal. He immediately took that question up with a number of the great steel manufacturers of the country and received assurances that not only could adequate steel be furnished but that one plant alone in the United States at the end of six months could turn out one ship and thereafter, I think, one a day. He also ascertained that instead of a 3,000-ton ship, by utilizing steel he could turn out ships of about 4,500 tons, with practically very little increase in cost. And so the program was modified to the extent that it was determined to begin at once the fabrication of steel ships as well as to build wooden ships.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think, if the gentleman will permit me to just complete a statement, it will then be of more value.

When before the committee on Wednesday or Thursday of last week—or early in the week, at any rate—the question of the tonnage to be constructed of wood or steel was raised by the committee. Gen. Goethals stated that he had reached the point when it was necessary to determine the extent of the wooden tonnage that was to be built at the present time; that in order to make his commitments and to enter into his arrangements with the various parties who would be furnishing materials to take part in this program it was necessary to know at this time how many wooden ships would be built, so that it would be possible to determine how much money would be required for wooden ships and how much would be available for steel ships. That had not been determined, but he made the statement that, in his opinion, it would be necessary at this time to limit the number of wooden ships to which we would be committed to about 150 or 200, and the program as agreed upon, or tentatively agreed upon, was to arrange at once for the construction of between 150 or 200 wooden ships of 3,000 tons and the entering upon a very extensive program in turning out the steel ships.

Mr. BRITTEN. Thirty-six hundred tons.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am speaking approximately. The tonnage of the wooden ships was increased to approximately 3,600 tons, and the tonnage of the steel ships to approximately 4,500 tons.

There were many things to be taken into consideration. The amount of seasoned timber that would be required for 3,000,000 tons of wooden ships could not possibly be obtained in 18 months, and the use of timber with the sap in it will give a life to a ship, according to the statement of a very eminent wooden shipbuilder, of approximately two or three years. The necessity of obtaining ships quickly is the one important thing at this time, and after these investigations this particular program was arranged.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as speaking by authority for all the persons concerned. I do, however, wish to make this statement, that apparently a controversy, which is unfortunate, has been broached in the newspapers between Mr. Denman, of the Shipping Board, and Gen. Goethals. I think much of the misunderstanding that has been believed to exist as the result of these statements can be readily cleared up if anyone will appreciate that the statement which Gen. Goethals is quoted as having made, and which I am informed is inaccurate in some respects, was made before a gathering of men engaged in the steel industry. In discussing this question before men engaged in the steel industry the matter could be readily presented from a viewpoint that would not be taken if a statement were being prepared for publication for the entire country. But so far as I am informed, after information received by me to-day, the Shipping Board and Gen. Goethals are not at loggerheads. There is no great friction existing between the board and the general. There were some differences of opinion originally because of the manner in which the program had to be taken up and agreed upon, so far as I am aware, and it is based upon information that comes from a reliable source. There is no reason for alarm that there are to be dissensions that will in any way impair the effectiveness of the organization that has been perfected for building these ships.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In view of the desire for harmony, and of course there is desire on the part of everyone for harmony, does the gentleman think the following, which appeared in the morning press as a part of an interview given by Mr. Denman, will conduce or tend toward harmony? I read:

> We believe that the committees of Congress and not a public dinner with the head of the Steel Trust are the places for the discussion of matters of policy with regard to shipbuilding.

Is that anything else than an insult to Gen. Goethals?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That sounds like a statement I would be likely to make myself.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then I will say that it was an insult to Gen. Goethals from the way it was given.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say, as an intimate personal friend of Gen. Goethals and a sincere admirer of his ability, that it is very unfortunate that he has been quoted in the press as he was quoted. The statement, however, is not accurate. I think where there are differences of opinion they had better be thrashed out——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was the report of the statement inaccurate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They had better be thrashed out before committees of Congress or before the proper departments of the Government that are charged with the responsibility of this Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said that the statement was incorrect. Does the gentleman mean the newspaper report of the statement was incorrect, or Gen. Goethals's statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I believe the newspaper report of the statement is inaccurate, from the information conveyed to me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is different.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How much seasoned lumber is there estimated to be in the country available for the construction of wooden ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I supposed that had been given out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is known is that if one concern in the United States can do what is stated—turn out one steel ship at the end of six months and one a day thereafter, steel ships can be turned out more rapidly than was contemplated. Arrangements have been made by which at the end of five or six months 400,000 tons of steel monthly can be furnished to the Shipping Board for steel ships, and that is more than they can possibly utilize if they use all the resources of this country for that purpose alone.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I understand the gentleman said that there was no great difference between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals. Was there a difference between the Shipping Board and Gen. Goethals as to the number of steel vessels and wooden vessels that could be built?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. What happened was this: In the course of the investigation Gen. Goethals made the statement that in his opinion the time had been reached when it was necessary to determine the number of wooden ships that would be built, in order that it would be possible to make commitments in contracts, and he said that while it had not been decided, he believed it would be from 150 to 200 ships. There was no controversy about it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I understood the gentleman to say when the matter came before them that it was stated that it would take three years for the timber to be seasoned so that the ships could be built.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not what I said. What I said was that the information I had from one of the largest and most successful builders of wooden ships in the United States was that timber with sap in it would probably last in a ship not to exceed a period of three years. I did not attribute that statement to Gen. Goethals.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall read just what happened in the committee. I asked Gen. Goethals in what proportion wooden and steel ships were to be turned out, and this is what transpired:

Gen. GOETHALS. I decided this morning that we would have to definitely decide upon the number of wooden ships that we contemplate building. We have prospective contractors all over the country. The very idea of getting a contract from the Government is appealing to everybody who has lumber, a shipyard, or some money. I do not see where we are going to come out unless we restrict it, and I am going to limit the first number of ships to within 150 or 200 wooden ships, and just see where I come out.

The CHAIRMAN. But the 3,000,000 tons does contemplate wood and steel?

Gen. GOETHALS. Yes.

Mr. DENMAN. I do not understand the General to mean that that is his permanent limitation for the entire 18 months, but for the matter of the present outlook and to see how the thing develops.

Gen. GOETHALS. Exactly.

Mr. DENMAN. Suppose we should find that through some permutation of things they could get these ships out in six or seven months. In that event it might be that we would pile more ships on the present contractors.

Gen. GOETHALS. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. You are figuring on shipping of 3,000,000 tons in 18 months, which, as you are at present informed, is about all of our capacity?

Gen GOETHALS. Yes.

So that there was no difference of opinion apparent in the committee. In the examination that took place Mr. Denman freely made suggestions or asked questions of Gen. Goethals, and Gen. Goethals freely made suggestions relative to his relations with the board.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to answer the question about seasoned lumber?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is at the present time in the hands of the manufacturers about 20 per cent of the entire annual cut of lumber, which would be between eight and ten billion feet of lumber. Seasoned lumber is not always required in building ships. The fir of the Pacific coast and the long-leaved pine of the South are not seasoned generally when put into a ship. It is put in green.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, Mr. Speaker, there is no controversy, so far as the members of the Committee on Appropriations are concerned, between steel and lumber for ships. The emergency exists for the Government to get shipping, and I am indifferent as to whether these ships are built of steel or of wood, so long as they are obtained. The purpose of the Shipping Board and of Gen. Goethals is to determine what type of ship shall be turned out most quickly and in the greatest number.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. As a matter of fact, as the gentleman probably knows, Circular No. 1 has been issued by Gen. Goethals, showing that they have already awarded contracts for steel and wooden vessels on the east and west coasts as far as Washington in the West and Florida in the South.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand so.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has repeatedly referred to 18 months as the limit in which the ships could be completed. Is there anything in the law requiring a limit in which the ships are to be completed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but it is based on our requirements for shipping within that time on account of the present war.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is nothing in the law limiting the expenditure to that period, is there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but that is the estimated amount of tonnage that we must obtain in 18 months for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has the gentleman noticed the statement in the New York Sunday Tribune that it was also in contemplation by Gen. Goethals to build ships of 15,000 tons, divided into very many small compartments, so that they would be practically unsinkable?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That appeared in the New York Tribune, and I do not know that there is any foundation for it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. A similar statement appeared in the Washington Post.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was there any evidence submitted to the gentleman's committee as to the relative value of wooden and steel ships after the war is over if we have a supply on hand?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is some information; yes. A steel ship is much more valuable.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it not a fact that the wooden ships will be practically worthless except as barges?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not say they would be worthless, but the steel ship, of course, is a more permanent ship. Then, another thing, the wooden ships that would be built would not conform to the Lloyds requirements. They would be somewhat less in structural strength than the requirements of the Lloyds but would still be seaworthy and sufficient for the purposes required.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman, in respect to wooden and steel ships, the steel ship is far more modern than the wooden ship, but there are wooden ships to-day on the Pacific Ocean that are 40 years old that are in good condition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true.

Mr. NOLAN. Is it not a fact that this whole wooden-ship program is based on the theory that we need the ships and need them immediately?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The wooden-ship program is based on the belief that it would be impossible to obtain steel in sufficient quantities to furnish the tonnage required.

Mr. NOLAN. That is the limitation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the wooden ship was a suggestion to meet that situation.

Mr. NOLAN. That is, that there would be a scarcity, not only of material but a scarcity of yards to build steel ships; a scarcity of material and a scarcity of labor, while on the wooden ship-building end of the proposition there was plenty of timber, plenty of opportunity to use the yards that are already building wooden ships, and plenty of opportunity at small cost to get wooden-ship yards in operation, and that we might utilize the wooden-ship builders that we have and get from the various trades men capable of building wooden ships. What we want is ships to carry our cargoes. We want them at the earliest opportunity, and I understand that is the basis for this wooden ship-building program of the shipping board.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The most imperative thing now needed is ships. The question is how to get them most quickly.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Gen. Goethals was appointed some six weeks ago, and this shipping board have been at work on this matter some two months. There have been many people here seeking to contract for ships for the past four or five weeks. What is the occasion for the delay in letting contracts for the building of these wooden ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was necessary in the first place to determine the type of ship, and then it was necessary to standardize the type, and it was not very easy inside of two or three days to let contracts for the construction of ships and have any knowledge of what they will cost without having plans and specifications; and you can not draw those over night.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That is very true as to two or three days; but six weeks' time is quite different.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Even six weeks is a very short time to turn out plans for a standardized type of ships that will be most desirable.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am reliably informed that Gen. Goethals said he would not contract for the building of ships until Congress provides the money. That is one reason, and a very good reason, why these contracts have been held up until the money is provided.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I have understood that they had the money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Fifty million dollars, but this contemplates construction to the extent of $750,000,000.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the relative life of a wooden ship with a steel ship, barring submarines and torpedoes and such casualties?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to ability to resist attack?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Barring those things like torpedoes and submarines, I mean the relative life of a wooden ship as compared with a steel ship.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It depends a good deal on the construction of the ship. Some wooden ships are very long lived, depending upon the character of the timber, the seasoning of the timber, while some of the steel ships will not last very long if the plates are not of sufficient thickness or they are not properly riveted or properly covered by rust-protecting paint. But the steel ship is considered more economical. One reason is that the steel ship will stand the pounding of the engines, and a much larger steel ship can be utilized with a certain power than a wooden ship. The wooden ships, if too much power is put into them, will have their sterns pounded off.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Was not there another element entering into the consideration, and that was that inasmuch as both types of ships must meet torpedoes that the loss sustained by the construction of the wooden ship would be less than that of the loss of the steel ship?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was not taken into consideration at all. The only thing taken into consideration was to get the ships quickly. It was realized that many of these ships would be lost, and that was the reason that they would be needed quickly. The question of relative cost of vessels had to be ignored.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The statement has been made on the floor of the House this afternoon that contracts have already been awarded to shipbuilders. If so, will the gentleman tell the House under what conditions contracts have been awarded, when the plans and specifications have just come out within the last three days?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not tell the gentleman——

Mr. BRITTEN. I have been told, was told a moment ago on the floor, that the corporation has entered into contracts with certain shipbuilders prior to the issue of plans and specifications. If that be true in the first instance, and 50 other shipbuilders are coming along to build under plans and specifications, where is the parallel going to be?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are not worrying about the contractor.

Mr. BRITTEN. But we are worrying about the money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is very simple. If we require certain raw materials to fabricate certain parts in accordance with specifications that are to be furnished at a later date upon a cost-plus basis——

Mr. BRITTEN. They are not awarded contracts on a cost-plus basis.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Or so much a ton.

Mr. BRITTEN. No——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What kind of a contract are they making if they are not doing it on a cost-plus basis or gross sum?

Mr. BRITTEN. They are taking contracts all over the United States for a lump sum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman say they are taking contracts for a lump sum?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is not the fact.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is the fact.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I say it is not the fact.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will tell the gentleman that they are doing it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor and the time.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman from New York asked me a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I shall stand for a good deal, but not for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman asked me what kind of a contract they awarded.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can make his statement as to what is being done, and I have no objection to it. The gentleman is not giving information, but only some rumors that he has heard.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have positive information coming from Gen. Goethals's office that they are awarding contracts in lump figures at approximately $300,000 for the hull and $200,000 additional for the machinery.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said they were making them on a cost-plus or tonnage basis. Of course, the gentleman does not seem to be aware of the fact that when they figure a ship of a certain tonnage, if they let a contract for a gross sum for the hull it is based on the tonnage. He may not know that fact.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is in error. They are asking for bids, and contractors have already taken contracts for the hull, and it is immaterial whether the net weight is 3,200 or 3,600 or 3,400, the price is $300,000 per hull, and it may be $220,000 or $280,000 for the machinery. The ship corporation has decided that it will not spend more than $300,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall repeat what I said before. The plans and specifications of the steel ship clearly provide how much steel is going into it; allowance is made for the fabrication of it, and the price is fixed on the tonnage.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am talking about wooden ships.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All I have to say about the contracts is that the best equipped man in the United States, Gen. Goethals, makes them in behalf of the United States Government. I do not know the particular method that he has adopted to arrive at what price should be paid, but he has demonstrated his capacity in the construction of the Panama Canal. The gentleman knows that if any impropriety has been adopted in arriving at the price, he can criticize the lump-sum contract——

Mr. BRITTEN. I am simply stating to the House what is going on; I am not criticizing the Shipping Board or the corporation or Gen. Goethals.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman seems to assume that because they are making lump-sum contracts that there is something improper about it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not; that is perfectly proper, but it is not a tonnage basis or fee basis, and the plans and specifications have only come out within three or four days.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a tonnage contract; and that is the only way they can reach the conclusion for the prospective bidder and person awarding the contract.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, now that we have the matter cleared up, I would like to ask a question of my colleague, and with his fund of information he will undoubtedly be able to answer it. I have understood that there is a great shortage at the present time of steel riveters. Has that been taken into consideration in contracting for these ships? That is a big item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They expect to get all of the trained mechanical help needed, and, if necessary, under this bill the President will have the power to suspend contracts where labor is utilized that can be utilized in shipbuilding, in order to get that labor diverted to the shipping work. That is one of the purposes of authorizing the suspension of contracts.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has considered in granting that power, which is not found in the Senate amendment, the power of Congress to delegate any such authority to the President of the United States, where it does not take over either the material or the men for any public purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have not attempted to solve all of the constitutional questions that ingenious, learned, and expert attorneys may raise about this bill. There is one school of law that professes that under the war power we can suspend all of the provisions of the Constitution. I do not agree to that theory, but I am inclined to believe that, while we might not be able to conscript labor, we would have the power to say to a manufacturer that he shall stop doing work under a certain contract so long as we compensate him for the damage that he sustains; and then the theory is that labor, not finding an opportunity to be utilized there, would readily accept employment at the place where the opportunity was given by the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman really think that that is a public purpose—merely to shut down a factory without taking over the use of the factory, the labor in the factory or the material produced in the factory?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose we take the factory over and then close it down?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think we would have any power to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not put me in the attitude where I shall be compelled in advance to solve all of the problems that belong to the United States Supreme Court. We should leave a little for them to do, but this is the situation. The necessity for these ships is imperative, and the probability is that many of the powers that it is proposed to be given will never be exercised; that there will never be any necessity for it. If a situation does arise where it is necessary, then I am willing that the President should have the power to exercise them, and when anybody questions it, have that question determined in the courts; but the safety and the perpetuity of our Government is the supreme matter at this time, and we ought not to hesitate to delegate the power necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Does the gentleman know that the Shipping Board and Gen. Goethals have given some consideration to the curtailment of production of structural steel for building purposes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was discussed, and it was at one time believed that it might be necessary to suspend the construction of all great steel buildings and other works, but later information demonstrates that that will not be necessary.

Mr. NOLAN. If it could be done, it would turn loose a vast army of mechanics that could be utilized both in the shop and out of the shop for shipbuilding purposes. I have reference to structural ironworkers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is believed now that what was feared would be necessary will not be necessary.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, as illustrating what the gentleman says about not having to use the powers embraced in the legislation, I desire to call attention to the fact that the powers granted in the naval appropriation bill of March 4 it has not been necessary to exercise. The gentleman will bear in mind that we made an appropriation authorizing the condemnation of the basic patents for aeroplanes, but without exercising that power the result that the Government desired has been obtained, and I am told that they will not expend more than $100 out of the million and a half that was appropriated. The results are obtained when we have the legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the interruption of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] brings to my mind another matter in connection with the amendment. A paragraph was inserted in the Senate amendment the purpose of which was to enable the Navy Department to requisition, to commandeer ships that are essential for certain purposes connected with the Navy. There is no such power now. In the rearrangement of this amendment that power is retained, and the authority of the President to delegate this power or exercise it through such agency or agencies as he may determine proper is intended to permit him to exercise that part of the power intended for the Navy through the Navy Department, and provision is also made that if any vessels are commandeered under this power for the Navy Department or for the War Department payment on account of it shall be out of appropriations available for that purpose specifically made for the Army or the Navy. The object of that limitation is to insure the use of the $750,000,000 for obtaining ships of a cargo-carrying character for the use of the Government in the manner contemplated. If this provision be adopted, it must be understood that this does not complete the legislation that is essential. There are a great many other questions for which provision must be made, questions of very great importance. The Committee on Appropriations when it was confronted with the question of considering the Senate amendment determined that the only authority it would include in the bill was that authority necessary to enable the ships to be secured rapidly with the commandeering powers, and that if further legislation would be necessary other very important questions ought to be left to consideration in a bill that should not come from the Committee on Appropriations. For instance, there was considerable insistence that some determination be made of the revenues to be derived from the operation of the ships.

There will be an enormous fund derived from these ships, and the more ships that are sunk the greater the fund will be. The revenues for the operating of the ships will be enormous. It is a very serious question whether Congress intends to place all of that money at the disposal of the Shipping Board or the President, or anybody else, or whether a portion of it is to be placed there, or just what is to be done. That question ought to be worked out in a bill that will take up other questions that necessarily must be considered by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. In the draft of this proposed change attempt was made to limit it to the authority to appropriate the money and grant the powers necessary to get the facilities and to eliminate all other questions that necessarily must be considered. As far as I am personally concerned, I would have been better pleased if the matter had not been put in this bill at all. The Senate put it in there.

Mr. PARK. Will the gentleman yield? Will he state if he has the information of the relative time which it would take to construct the steel ships and the wooden ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not the information.

Mr. PARK. Then, can you answer this question——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield; I can not give it in actual time, but under the plan that is going to be pursued the steel ships will be built faster than the wooden ships will be.

Mr. PARK. Well, the relative cost of the two——

Mr. SHERLEY. The cost will vary somewhat.

Mr. PARK. Does not the gentleman think that we want to build wooden and steel ships as fast as possible? In fact, faster than they can sink them?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not started to build any yet. The program is to turn out wooden ships in the most rapid manner possible.

Mr. FARR. Did I understand the gentleman to say that at the end of six months we will be able to get one steel ship a day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From one concern; I mean, fabricated. It will be necessary then to put it together.

Mr. FARR. How long will it be, then, before we will have that ship for use?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries were holding hearings on shipping, Mr. Fenton, the editor of the Iron Age, testified that the keel of one of those freighters on the Great Lakes, a 10,000-ton freighter, was laid and the vessel was built and under steam in 90 days; that that was a standardized ship. I do not think there is any question but that if the Shipping Board will adopt the standard of steel freight ships, that they can build them quicker than they can build wooden ships. And, of course, long ago we abandoned the wooden ship for the steel ship, although Great Britain saw the advantage sooner than we did, and in that way we lost advantage, largely, in the upbuilding of our merchant marine. I do not think it is the intention of the Shipping Board to recur to the old type except in matters of national emergency.

Mr. FARR. Will they be able to get the machinery as quickly as the hulls?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a question of the type of the ship.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I wanted to ask this question: Did not the gentleman state that they had limited the number of ships to 100, 150, or 200—the wooden ships?

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the present; yes.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Do I understand, then, that the board have made up their mind that that is to be the capacity of the country, in so far as the building of wooden ships is concerned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. But it was deemed advisable at this time to build between 150 and 200 wooden ships so that they could see where they were coming out on the expenditures. They have not unlimited authority, although they have $750,000,000. They have to consider the cost of every ship and the ability to get them, and they did not wish to make too many commitments to wooden ships that could not be built in the time desired.

Mr. VAN DYKE. The gentleman also stated, if I am correct, that the steel company had made the statement that they could turn out a ship a day after the expiration of six months.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to say to the gentleman that I just telephoned Gen. Goethals, and am glad to say that the gentleman from Illinois was correct when he said to the chairman of the committee that they were not contracting for the wooden ships on a tonnage basis. The general said it is not the intention of the corporation to contract for these ships at all on the tonnage basis. He said the contracts that had been awarded up to the present time were awarded on this basis: That where a shipbuilder was asked for a bid on which he could construct a certain character of ship—whether it be 3,500 tons or 4,500 tons or 5,000 tons, it was immaterial—he presented his plans and specifications and said, "I am prepared to construct this character of ship now for so much money." And after the marine architects had O. K'd his plans and his price was found to be reasonable he got the contract for one or two or as many as he could build, after they had investigated his plant. The ships are not of any specific kind, but any kind of a ship that can be used in the service and that the builder can get out quickly. The 150 or 200 wooden ships that the shipping corporation is to get out will be contracted for not on the tonnage basis, but on lump-sum bids to be taken by various district officers representing the shipping corporation, and those prices will vary. They will be approximately in the neighborhood of $300,000 for the hulls and an additional $200,000 for the machinery. The machinery is not contracted for now, but will be purchased by the Government and sent to the various shipyards as the hulls near completion. I have known Gen. Goethals for some years and regard him most highly as an engineer and a man of the highest integrity. I am sincerely pleased to see him given full control of the shipping corporation, where he will prove himself worthy of the great confidence being placed in him. He will get the ships out and on the high seas if anyone can.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman explain to the House what his amendment will do—as to whether these ships are to be wooden or steel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has nothing to do with it at all. We do not attempt in any way to control them.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. How many contracts for wooden ships have been let already?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. That was not stated before the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether or not any time is desired by anybody. If not, I will be glad to have a vote.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was wanting to ascertain, if it were possible, how much time would be required.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that the gentleman from New York take an hour's time without losing the floor and then yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given another hour.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may have an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may have an hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman said, at the beginning of his statement, that he would discuss the operation of these ships. I do not find anything in the committee amendment that authorizes the President or anyone else to operate these ships, while there is such a provision in the Senate amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state to the gentleman that the intention was to include that authority. If the Senate amendment is not incorporated, a provision to that effect will be put in, because the intention was to delegate to the President the authority not only to acquire, but also to operate the ships.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I probably will not use a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say, especially to Members on this side of the House, that as one of the minority of the committee I am in general accord with the position stated by the chairman. I do not mean that I commit myself necessarily, any more than he does, to every item that has been prepared, but I feel that although we are here giving unprecedented and enormous power to the President of the United States, yet the crisis is unprecedented, and I can see no method of efficiently and adequately meeting it except by vesting in the Executive every weapon which can be safely and effectively used.

I might add that my cheerfulness in conferring this vast authority is not diminished by the fact that the President has in this instance exercised wiser judgment in the selection of his assistant and agent than at any previous time in his career, and that Gen. Goethals has my unbounded confidence. This legislation portends such a sweeping interference with our normal industrial life and allows such a diversion of both labor and capital from their natural channels into the Government service that it brings home to me quite as forcibly as any matter which has come before us the fact that we are just entering a war which is likely to change our whole course of business life and our whole viewpoint. This makes a large part of our manufacturing industry subordinate to the prosecution of the war, and indicates how we will all soon be forced to contemplate changes in our methods of life, and sacrifice not only our convenience and our pleasure but our serious interests to the changing Government needs. I believe that the people, as soon as they appreciate the necessity, will readily conform to it. We ought to act at once. Commitments and contracts and expenses are being made now without legal authority, but with faith that Congress will excuse and ratify them because of the great emergency, and we ought as speedily as possible end that condition by appropriating the necessary money. And so representing the minority of the committee, I urge that this bill be at once sent to conference.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL].

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to speak on this particular amendment that is now before the committee, but I desire to direct the attention of the committee to Senate amendment No. 15, on page 19, which reads as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to enlist 1,200 competent cooks as sergeants, first class, Quartermaster Corps, for the duration of the war only, to be trained as cook instructors and to be employed as such.

I hope that the House, through the conference committee, will concur in this amendment. It is just as important to have efficient cooking for the soldier boys as it is to have the proper clothing and equipment for them. In the Spanish-American War of 1898 it is a well-established fact that many of our soldiers suffered sickness and death in concentration and drilling camps on account of the food and bad cooking. The trouble was not then, nor will it be in the future, with the supply of food, but with the unscientific handling and cooking of the same.

The amendment proposed by the Senate will, I believe, in a great measure solve the Army subsistence problem in this great crisis. It has the unqualified indorsement of the Army officials, who recognize the importance that ought to be attached to the proper feeding of the soldiers.

As a rule, the young men of our country who, because of their intense devotion to the flag, volunteer or are desirous of getting into the Army, want to carry a gun and saber at the front, and not be in the cooking tent. But if they are detailed to do the cooking the chances are they know nothing at all about the art of cooking. The older men, who have been trained in the art of cooking, usually are men of families and do not get into the Army at all. We will need thousands of Army cooks in this war, and some method ought to be employed to prepare these men for this particular work. There ought to be some inducement for young men to engage in Army cooking, and if they are trained as cooks they will have learned a real vocation, so that after the service of war is over positions will be waiting for them in the great hotels of the country. And the man who is a trained cook in the Army is just as patriotic as the man with a gun, and, in my judgment, as important a unit in his regiment as any private therein.

We all know that the soldier's life at best is hard enough and the Government ought to feed the soldiers with the very best cooked food.

I desire at this time to incorporate as a part of my remarks a letter to the Secretary of War written by Prof. M. D. Kelly, president of the Muncie National Institute, of Muncie, Ind., and indorsed by a number of the leading citizens of the United States; and also a letter written by the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the United States Senate.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1917.

To the honorable SECRETARY OF WAR OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: Reducing to more concrete form and in an attempt to arrive at a basis for concrete action in carrying out discussions and proposals heretofore had with the honorable Secretary of War, Gen. Hugh L. Scott, Gen. Sharpe, Adjt. Gen. McCain, Capt. Bjornshad, Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, Vice President MARSHALL, and a large number of other officials and interested persons from whom advice has been sought, the following statements, arguments, and proposals are hereby respectfully submitted:

First. The problem of proper feeding of an army in the field is of fundamental importance at all times and is a matter which at present must be of vital concern to the honorable Secretary and the various executive authorities in the Army, which it is assumed is under the Department of the Quartermaster General.

Second. The massing of the huge Army into training camps and into actual field service which is now contemplated, all of which must be done under conditions of haste, makes this problem of proper food regulation and service (always beset with difficulty) now a matter of more than usual hardship and one in which it is the desire of the proposer herein to be of service to the War Department and to the Army and to our common country.

Third. The Muncie National Institute, located at Muncie, Ind., is approximately the center of population of the United States, and is a comprehensively organized and successfully conducted vocational school, where professional, technical, occupational, prevocational, and vocational courses of study are given to a large number of men and women numbering from 2,000 to 2,500 there attending annually. While it is an accredited institution where academic and cultural courses are supported, and is rated as a standard normal school for the training of teachers, as well as having a duly commissioned and accredited preparatory or high school department, and a college department in which the usual college degree courses are given, its primary and fundamental emphasis is laid upon agriculture, home economics, manual training, fine arts mechanical training, and cookery. Practical application is made of all theory to the end that instruction given and preparation made by students shall enable those who make their preparation there to actually put into execution and practically apply and teach all theoretical and fundamental principles under the actual working conditions which they will confront in the various trades and occupations into which they go. Although the institute has at present entered into only its fifth year of actual operation, upward of 6,000 men and women have been trained and are now engaged in industries and professions throughout the United States, and are meeting with success because of the practical and cultural attainments secured through the pursuit of some one or more of the various courses offered and the mental adjustment and inspiration which has been a result of their training in contact with the school atmosphere at Muncie. The institute has been brought into existence through the investment and contribution of various individuals who are interested in the promotion and advancement of the best ideals and practices in technical and vocational education for all schools, both public and private, throughout the country. These contributions and investments have been secured at the solicitation of the undersigned, who originated the movement at Muncie and has been its general leader from the beginning. The sum total expended up to date in bringing about this foundation exceeds the sum of $1,000,000. In addition to the magnificent main college building, having a floor space of nearly 2 acres in extent and located on a picturesque campus of 10 acres, the institute owns and operates in the vicinity of the school and its dormitories 160 acres of land for practical farm purposes. For a more comprehensive view of the scope and organization of the work in various departments reference is made to a copy of the general catalogue herewith submitted.

Fourth. It is the desire of the Muncie National Institute, through the undersigned, to offer the use and benefit of its entire resources, organization, laboratory and field equipment, executive management, etc. (or so much thereof as may be required), to the service of the War Department, with the object in view of cooperating with the said department to the end that a thoroughly competent corps of Army cooks and bakers shall be trained for the service of the Army, in the best and most approved methods now in use or which can be devised from knowledge of the present practices and equipment and schools of the United States Army and of other armies now engaged in modern warfare.

Fifth. It would seem that a feasible plan, and one that would secure immediate results, would be to have the Muncie National Institute recognized and designated as a central training camp for Army cooks and bakers and for instructors in this art, who, being once thoroughly trained and inspired to the service, can be sent wherever required in any department of the Army, wherever located, to instruct and direct others in this particular line of service. It is understood by the undersigned that some 1,200 especially trained men who will be qualified to act as instructors to others will be required in the actual feeding of the large army contemplated should be available by September 1. It is the hope of the institute that it may be permitted to cooperate or, better still, to have the actual responsibility for the training of this body of primary instructors under such limitations and directions and according to such required standards as the honorable Quartermaster General or your department may advise and require. By slight changes and additions to present facilities one company of Army strength, or 160 men, could be put in training immediately. To this number could be added other units, with comparatively short delay, until, if desirable, the full 1,200 men now required to be trained as instructors could be in actual training at this central point, and as rapidly as the service is required in the various departments of the Army they would be made available and held ready for call.

Sixth. It is assumed that the training to be given in this central training school shall be given under field conditions, and that a sufficient supply of camps, cooking and field supplies as actually used now in the Army will be supplied to the school by the Government. The location for the camp will be supplied by the institute, and is magnificently located at a point where natural drainage, proper sewerage, water mains, fuel supplies, and other necessary requirements should make the camp an ideal and a healthful location for the very special and important work contemplated. It has been the experience heretofore that not everyone who may apply for this grade of service or who may be arbitrarily assigned to it will be fitted by nature and their attributes to succeed in it. Aptitude in the service and ability to instruct in it will be discovered very shortly after candidates have been assigned to classes to begin taking practical instruction. Those unsuited for any cause or who show no likelihood of becoming expert and inspiring instructors in the art, after having been through the special training proposed, should be dropped, and only those who are especially apt and show good talent be permitted to continue and finally graduate.

Seventh. Military discipline and Army regulations for soldiers in the field should be at all times enforced at this central training camp. This it would seem would require a detail by your department of the proper military officers to control and supervise all matters pertaining to Regular Army life and to enforce military standards. The detail of the proper military officers and perhaps the arming of the proper executive officers of the institute with military power by your department would seem to be sufficient to cover these necessities, and would doubtless be arranged for by your department very easily, and with the assurance on our part of our thorough willingness to respond with alacrity to any regulations which will make the service most useful and quickly valuable to your department.

Eighth. We have made a comprehensive study of the present Army manual and requirements covering the subjects of baking and cooking. We have also called into conference and have had the benefit of reviewing the manuals now in use by the British Army. We have also studied the physical equipments and paraphernalia such as field ranges, methods of heating, fuels, tools for feeding an army on the march, cost accounting systems, menu sheets, food values, and the elements required, and substitutes therefor, for the production of the necessary number of calories, etc. Our aim and purpose will be to adopt the present manuals and to take the recommendations in all things of the Quartermaster General or his proper representatives, using these as the present basis for a course of study to be used in connection with the present forms of field equipment, camps, etc. It is our firm conviction, however, that by devoting our resources to an intensive study of the subject matter and through the application and practical trial of well defined theories which we have, and through cooperation with your department, an improved and more simplified and efficient manual and field equipment may be brought into existence and the service in the Quartermaster's Department very much facilitated, improved, and made more efficient.

Ninth. As a guaranty that this work will prove successful, if the responsibility therefor shall be delegated to the Muncie National Institute by your department, we cite the fact that this institution has already been indorsed as the one most desirable and properly organized agency in the whole United States as the affiliation for the proposed national hotel training school which is to be brought into existence through the joint effort and cooperation of the great hotels, restaurants, and food companies of the United States. This determination was arrived at at a national conference of the representatives of the great hotels and hotel organizations of the United States which was held on the ground at Muncie, Ind., on May 2 last. This was the culmination of the agitation and movement which has been conducted by the hotel men and hotel organizations of the United States which has lasted for more than six years last past, and during which every phase of this great undertaking and theories connected with its proper founding have been considered and ably discussed and minutely investigated, it being the desire of those who will stand sponsor for it that no mistake shall be made in the founding of a national vocational school, which shall represent the highest ideals and the best practices of the hotel and public feeding industry which is now the fourth greatest industry in this country, measured by the number of people engaged in it and the volume of money invested. (See account of meeting and resolutions adopted in Hotel World hereto attached.) The courses of study and practices in classes for schools of this kind now maintained in Germany, Switzerland, France, and England have been thoroughly investigated and the fruits of their experience in the way of courses of study which have been found workable and practicable will be incorporated and adopted as the basis for the various courses of study, designed for this institution. As will be readily seen, there are many phases and technical features into which the manifold and specialized departments of this work naturally fall. But the problem of the institute and its chief concern has been to work out along thoroughly scientific and practical lines various phases of vocational training, and to this end it has made liberal use of the proven theories of vocational guidance. The institute can now assure your department that it can summon to its assistance the very highest class of instructors which will be made available to it by the great hotel and restaurant interests of the country, and that it is assured of the hearty and thorough cooperation of the strong hotel and restaurant men and of their resources in every way and in such a degree as may be necessary in order to make its proposed work of training Army cooks and instructors in Army cookery thoroughly effective.

The desire of the hotel men as well as of the institute is to provide at this time the most generous and ample means possible for cooperation with the War Department in an American solution of the problem of thoroughly protecting and feeding an American Army in the interest of its health and efficiency, as well as likewise to utilize and conserve proper food values. The past successes, present operation, and actual attendance of students now at the institute, where operations continue practically the year around, plus the unanimous approval and indorsement and financial and moral aid which is guaranteed through assistance to be rendered in good faith by hotel interests of the Nation, indicate that there has been called into existence and raised up, centering at Muncie, Ind., the best available agency, in our opinion, with which the Army may at present cooperate in the solution of a problem which is quick with interest and considered fundamental to the success of the Army not only by those Army officers who face the problem but by the great body of American citizens who will stay at home and watch with the closest and most vital concern the welfare and progress of those sent forth to defend the Nation and to uphold its standards.

Tenth. As compensation for carrying into effect the plan of cooperation above suggested in all its phases, which will continually be responsive to the needs of your department and conducted according to the immediate and far-reaching necessities of the Army, the institute has this suggestion to submit:

That the Government shall supply all equipment, paraphernalia, food stores, etc., and that only the actual cost to the institute of providing location, authorized instruction, and training facilities and executive management necessary, plus 10 per cent overhead charge, payable to the institute, shall be chargeable to the Government or to the Army Department. An addition to the present facilities of the institute for the doing of this work in the way of the extensions of kitchens, laboratories, extension of water mains, sewers, etc., and as preliminary provision for the execution of the work on a scale extensive enough to train several hundred or perhaps a thousand men at one time, would require the investment on the part of the institute of a sum estimated roughly at this time at $25,000. This the institute will expect the Army Department to bear. No further compensation would be desired by the institute than what would be covered in the proposal herein suggested, namely, the actual cost of installation of equipment and instructing the men under such regulations as would be laid down by the Army authorities, plus the overhead charge or safety provision for the payment of, say, 10 per cent in addition to the actual cost to be paid to the undersigned.

Very respectfully submitted.

MAY 2, 1917.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: A number of trained cook instructors should be available in connection with the organization of additional military forces. These men should be enlisted and trained for their duties before the additional forces are actually organized. They must be recruited from a great number of civilian cooks. They should then be trained by cook instructors now in the Army.

An opportunity presents itself to accomplish the above in connection with the training camps now being established for the training of reserve officers and candidates for appointment as such.

The War Department desires authority to enlist 1,200 expert civilian cooks as sergeants, first class, Quartermaster Corps, for the duration of the war only, and for use as cook instructors after being instructed in the duties of this position. Their instruction will be given during the time that they are employed as cooks at the training camps referred to. This plan would enable the War Department to assign one cook instructor to each battalion of new troops. It is requested that a proviso substantially as given below be included in the Army appropriation bill now in conference, or elsewhere:

"That the Secretary of War is authorized to enlist 1,200 competent cooks as sergeants, first class, Quartermaster Corps, for the duration of the war only, to be trained as cook instructors and to be employed as such."

The pay of a sergeant, first class, Quartermaster Corps, is $45 per month in the first enlistment.

Very respectfully.

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The question and method of training cooks is very thoroughly set forth in this letter from Prof. Kelly to the Secretary of War, and the need of such cooks is set forth in the letter written by the Secretary of War.

Prof. Kelly is a well-known educator along vocational lines and has the support of the leading hotel associations all over the United States.

As I have said and as indicated by the answer of the Secretary of War, the War Department has given this amendment its unqualified support, and I hope that the amendment will be concurred in by the House, through its conferees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to subdivision (b) of the committee amendment, which reads as follows:

To modify, cancel, requisition, or suspend the performance of any contract now in force or hereafter made for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material, or any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be used for shipbuilding.

It is this phrase to which I wish to call special attention:

Any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be used for shipbuilding.

I do not know that I shall offer any amendment, because all of these amendments will be disagreed to, and this entire matter must be settled ultimately in conference. But I do think that the House ought to understand what is proposed by this subdivision that I have read to the House. I, for one, believe that Congress has a wide and extensive power under what is popularly known as the war powers of Congress, or really implied powers growing out of specifically enumerated powers relating to the war, found in the Constitution. But I undertake to say that no one, upon careful consideration, will agree that Congress has any such power as proposed in this subdivision. For what does this subdivision do? I grant that we have the right to take over anything for a public use. We may take over the whole or any part of a factory for any use of the Government. We may take over material, and perhaps we may take men—conscript men for the Government service—even in shipyards. But this amendment empowers the President of the United States to shut down a factory or suspend a contract where the Government does not propose to take over a single pound of material or utilize a single man employed in the factory or use any portion of that factory. In short, it means that if this remains in the bill the President may shut down a factory in your town without making any use of it for the Government, and solely for the purpose of coercing the men who are employed in that factory to go to some Government works for a job or starve. That is exactly what it means.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would not the taking of the men there be for a public purpose?

Mr. LENROOT. No; because it does not propose to take the men.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman said it proposed to take them.

Mr. LENROOT. No; that is not taking the men, for the initiative lies with the men. There is nothing in the bill that says these men shall be employed in any Government work.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But the Government certainly would not take men away from their employment for a Government purpose unless it took them to work somewhere else.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Government does not take them under the bill. That is exactly the point I am making.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But the gentleman assumes that is what the Government was going to do, to transfer the men.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not. I will repeat my statement. The purpose is to drive men out of employment so that they will voluntarily have to seek work in a Government yard or starve; but the Government does not propose to take them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman think the bill gives the Government that power?

Mr. LENROOT. I said it did not give the Government the power to take the men, but it does give the Government the power to shut down a factory, without any public purpose being served thereby. That is the point I make.

Mr. HARDY. If that is the case, would it not be unconstitutional?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it is unconstitutional. That is the point I make.

Mr. HARDY. And clearly inoperative in that respect.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is presuming all the time that in a state of war, when the National Government is supposed to protect the interests of the citizenship of the country, it will act against the best interests of the citizenship. Now, if this right is given to the President, and he might want to exercise it in an emergency, might we not find even the laboring men at the manufacturing establishments, or the owner thereof sufficiently patriotic to meet that emergency and not raise any contest about it; and if it is not operative, it does not amount to anything.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not question that, but the power might be exercised without getting the men. My point is simply this: That under the decisions of the Supreme Court as they stand to-day it is difficult enough to sustain these various powers that we are granting to the President, and when we do grant those powers we are declaring against the latest decisions of the Supreme Court. I am willing to do that, trusting that the Supreme Court will in the future modify its decisions in that respect. But for the sake of sustaining legislation that is proper and legislation that is necessary, we should make it clear that we are resting everything that we do upon some basis that has some reason to stand upon.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Suppose a steel company is now manufacturing steel for some purpose that is not in connection with the war and not for the purpose of carrying on the war, and suppose the Government wants to cancel contracts of that character and take the steel for ships or to build cars. Should not the Government have the right to cancel those contracts?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely, and that far I am not making the slightest objection.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Does this do more than that?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; it does. For instance, a building is being erected in my town. The contractor owns the material. The Government desires not a pound of that material, but under this power it can suspend the erection of that building in my city or your city for the sole purpose of driving those men out of employment and seeking to compel them voluntarily to seek employment elsewhere.

Mr. CHARLES B. SMITH. Is not that an exaggerated assumption?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is not an exaggerated assumption, for the reason that in the naval bill at the last session—I am violating no confidence in saying we were told that power was desired in the naval bill for that express purpose.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If as you say the President may close a factory in order to obtain the services of the workmen for the Government, would not that arresting of the earning capacity of the employer be equivalent to taking private property for public uses?

Mr. LENROOT. Not for public uses, because not one of those employees might enter the Government service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand, but the President has arrested this employer's opportunity to make any return on his investment, or the use of his capital, has he not?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And in that sense that man's property, his power to earn anything on that property, has been taken away from him?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And he is entitled under the Constitution to just compensation.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And under this bill, too.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not see exactly the point the gentleman makes. The Government puts itself at a prejudice every time it does it.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the Government is paying $3 a day or $4 a day. A man in my town with a family is earning $3 a day. He could be thrown out of employment unless he came to the Atlantic coast to work for $3 a day. What justice is there in that?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I might say that while in individual instances it might work a hardship, it is no more a hardship than to take the body of the man and put him into the battle field.

Mr. LENROOT. If the bill undertook to conscript a man so that the Government retained his services it might be defended on constitutional grounds, but there is nothing to be gained for the Government so far as the bill is concerned, and I say it is absolutely beyond and outside of the constitutional power.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman concede that when the Government invokes the authority granted by this bill it puts itself under all the constitutional penalties of making the damages good?

Mr. LENROOT. If there is a riveter whom the Government needs and the Government has the power to take him, it ought to put its hand on the riveter and say the same as we are saying to the men under the selective-draft law, "Your country needs you and you are rendering a patriotic service in what you do," but we ought not, without doing that, deprive him of his means of employment and the power to feed his family, without at the same time putting him into the Government service.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose instead of providing that the Government could suspend this contract and in that case it is to make compensation for the damage it occasions, the bill provided that the Government could conscript the labor, then the manufacturer would be in the position where his operations would be suspended and he would get no compensation.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under this form we do him justice because we say he is operating a plant the operation of which makes it impossible for the Government to get labor and we stop it and pay damages. In the other case we would take the labor and leave him without redress.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Here is the situation: In the one case you take care of the manufacturer and compensate him, but as far as the laborer is concerned there is no compensation for the laborer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is assuming that when the Government employs the labor it is to treat the labor unjustly. I am assuming that the Government will treat it justly, because under the existing law it must pay the prevailing rate of wages.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand; but the gentleman knows that when you ask a man with a family to travel 1,500 miles to take a job at $3 a day he has lost money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am assuming that the Government would pay the expenses.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that labor would like the bill to carry a provision for requisitioning them?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think so, and I do not think there ought to be any such power in the bill, for this reason: When you take over material in a factory you have reached out as far as it is necessary for the Government to reach in dealing with this question.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Does not the gentleman recognize in matters of construction the purpose of the act is to be taken into account as well as the language?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. There is no language in the act under which the President is empowered to close factories for the purpose of throwing workmen out of employment so that they may be compelled to enter the Government employ elsewhere.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there is; and that is the language I am objecting to.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman call my attention to it?

Mr. LENROOT. He is authorized "to suspend the performance of any contract now in force or hereafter made for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material, or any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be utilized for shipbuilding." That is exactly my objection. Not only that, I would not probably make the contention had I not reason to believe that it has been the intention of the administration to utilize that very power, to shut down industries in the United States for no other purpose than to deprive men of employment and compel them to seek employment under the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think he wants that statement to go in that form, that the administration intends to use that power to close down manufactories to deprive men of employment. They close down industries in order to be able to utilize labor in other capacities.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I meant by my statement.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask the gentleman, Who placed that construction on it? Was it not the editor of a newspaper and not a lawyer, and does the gentleman believe that a lawyer or a court would place any such construction on the language?

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the gentleman what it does mean, if it does not mean just the definition I have given to it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I believe it means just this: That where the result of the action will be to give the Government the labor to do what is contemplated in the section, but I do not believe that it admits of the interpretation that you can shut down a factory where it does not result in giving the Government the labor necessarily as the result of what you do.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. May I assume that the gentleman appreciates the patriotism of the man who is conscripted to fight in the trenches as comparable with the man conscripted to work in the factory or in the shipyard or on the farm for the purposes of agriculture?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman has emphasized the fact that under this provision to which he refers a man may be compelled to give up his position in the gentleman's State and be removed with his family to some point in the State from which I come, at, it is true, an equal daily recompense; but he emphasizes the loss the man entails by reason of the necessity of his removal. What has the gentleman to say about the man who, perhaps, is earning five or ten thousand dollars a year, who is conscripted into the Army and sent to the trenches in France, where his recompense is $35 a month?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to appreciate the difference between a man conscripted into the Army, where he has honorable service and patriotic recognition of the service which he performs, and a man without any such status. If he is injured, what do we give him? If he dies, what do we give to his widow?

Mr. HULBERT. There is a little consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. Very little consideration.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does not this apply to an entirely different case, where you find a steel company or construction works doing a great, big job and the Government wants to employ them in building ships, and it says to the steel works, "We will employ you building ships and relieve you from your previous contract or suspend it, and you bring all of your laborers with you and work on ships in the same factory"?

Mr. LENROOT. But that is not the proposition here. That is covered by other provisions of the bill, which I entirely approve.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], it seems to me, takes rather an extreme view touching the construction to be placed upon subsection (b) of the proposed amendment to Senate amendment numbered 2, and whether his view be extreme as to the law I feel certain that his view is unwarranted as to the intent. I do not think anything has happened which warrants the assertion that this administration, or any other administration, desires to close down factories for the purpose of putting men out of employment in order to compel them to work for the Government of the United States. But this situation is going to confront us: Beyond question we are going to see, not only in connection with the steel industry but in connection with many other industries, a total inability to perform the work for the Government that is necessary in the prosecution of the war and at the same time perform the ordinary work that is performed in peace times, and no man when it comes to an issue of priority will hesitate for a moment as to the need and the right of the Government to claim that priority for that work which is essential for it to successfully prosecute this war. The difficulty that all of us are confronted with, a difficulty that perhaps none of us will ever be able to entirely remove, is that this war is of such tremendous magnitude and involves so many other things than simply fighting that it is impossible for the ordinary mind to grasp the complete revolution that is going to take place in our habits during the time of the war. This country is going to see many things that were permissible and permitted in times of peace necessarily stop, if we are to prosecute this great war with any efficiency whatever. What the committee had undertaken to do is to give to the President the powers that may be necessary in order to quickly build ships, for at the present time there is no matter so important for the successful termination of the war as the supplying of tonnage as far as it can possibly be supplied for the transportation of food, of men, and of munitions across the ocean, and it is a brave man who would want to stand in the way of the powers that may be necessary for that purpose. It may be desirable to modify paragraph (b) by substituting the word "necessary" for the word "utilized" found in the last part of the paragraph, so that it would read:

(b) To modify, cancel, requisition, or suspend the performance of any contract now in force or hereafter made for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material, or any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be necessary for shipbuilding.

The only effect of that would be to make further evident and apparent that the purpose of taking over or suspending or modifying a contract is because the performance of that contract necessarily interferes with the doing of something—in this instance the building of ships—necessary for the prosecution of the war; and in that way, I believe, it is easily possible to tie it within the powers that are given to Congress under the provisions of the Constitution that confer the right to declare war and necessarily prosecute it and to have all the powers that must flow from that first grant.

I want to say just a word, not about the form of this amendment, because, as the House is aware, the amendment is simply a substitute for the Senate amendment, and of necessity will have to be a matter of consideration by the conferees of the two Houses and subsequently by the Houses when it comes to an approval or disapproval of any conference report that might be submitted; but I desire to say a word or two about the shipbuilding program. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has accurately stated the present situation. I think it is extremely desirable at this particular time that men should be slow and that the press should be slow to exaggerate little matters into big matters. It is very easy by looking at a skin abrasion under a magnifying glass to believe that you have discovered a cancer, and it is very easy by exaggeration of differences on immaterial matters that may have arisen to discover that men are at loggerheads and that a governmental program is going to be set at naught, and the best possible way to set it at naught is to undertake to accentuate the differences that may or may not have existed and by accentuating them to lead to others. I believe I can state with knowledge, arrived at not only from statements made before the committee but from knowledge obtained at first hand, that there is now no substantial difference between the Shipping Board and Maj. Gen. Goethals touching what should be done in order to carry out the shipbuilding program.

It is the desire of everybody to build as many ships as quickly as we can, and facts, infinitely more than theories, are going to determine how far those ships can be built of wood, how far of steel, and how far of both. At present it is the intention to construct at least 150 to 200 wooden ships with a tonnage of about 700,000 tons and to construct the balance of steel, making an aggregate tonnage of 3,000,000 that it is hoped to reach at the end of 18 months. I have no doubt that when this program has been entered upon for a few months there will come of necessity modifications of it as it now exists. Whether those modifications will be one way or the other I am not wise enough to prophesy, and I doubt if anyone is. But I feel satisfied that when the real ability of America is turned onto this program that we will surprise ourselves in our capacity to turn out ships suitable for use in the North Atlantic trade, and ships that so far as possible will represent carrying capacity and speed such as to minimize the danger that they must run from the submarine. [Applause.] The important thing for Congress to do now is not to delay the matter by undertaking itself to determine how they had best be built. Congress is not the kind of body that can determine administrative problems of that sort. Our business is to furnish the money and the necessary power for the doing of the work. Then the responsibility rests where the committee has placed it, upon the President of the United States, who is given the power to employ such agency or agencies at such time and for such time as he may see fit. And then when men have been given a fair trial, if they have made good, all America will be grateful to them, and the world the better for their making good. If they fail, they, like other men in this great emergency, will have to be broken and men who can succeed will take their place. But for us here to undertake to determine these administrative matters would be to make a mistake of the first magnitude. I hope that it may be possible to send this bill in a few moments into conference, and that before the week is out we may have it upon the statute books, and have the money and the law to do things instead of debating and theorizing about how administrative officers should do things. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield to me four or five minutes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] wanted three minutes, and I will yield to him now, and afterwards yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, and then ask for a vote.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I do not think I will take three minutes, but I want to speak to the question raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He called attention to section (b), and says that that means that the President is empowered to requisition labor when he can not utilize it for the purpose of building ships. I call attention to the language of the section, and I will read simply——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent what I said. I never claimed the President had power to requisition the labor under this bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No. The gentleman did not understand me. I said, as I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin, his position was this, that the President would have the right to suspend operations under a contract by virtue of section (b), although the only effect of it would be to shut down a factory, and then by inference compel the employees to go a distance of 1,500 miles and take employment with the Government elsewhere.

Mr. LENROOT. That is right.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, I say that is not a reasonable construction of this statute, and that the primary rule of construction always is that it shall be reasonable. And I say, moreover, that it not only is not a reasonable construction of the contract but I say it is not in accord with the language which is actually used. I call attention to the language:

To modify, cancel, requisition, or suspend the performance of any contract now in force or hereafter made for the building, production, or purchase of ships or material, or any contract now existing or hereafter made for any purpose which requires in the execution thereof labor or material that may be utilized for shipbuilding.

Now, you grant power to modify or suspend any contract which requires labor or material. What kind of labor or material? That which may be utilized for shipbuilding. Is there any court in the world that is going to say you are utilizing the labor by throwing it out of employment and then the laborer saying, "If I go 1,500 miles somewhere I may possibly find employment"? Of course, no court in the world would for one moment entertain that as a reasonable construction or a construction which should be adopted.

Now, what that means, and what any court in the world would construe it to mean, is simply this: That if a plant is using material and labor for some other purpose, and that plant and that labor may be utilized for shipbuilding, then the President under this section would have the right, instead of allowing them to complete the labor which they have in hand and which is not useful for this great purpose which the Nation has in view, to go in and say, "We will utilize this labor and this material, and instead of building a store or a house we will use it for the purpose of shipbuilding." That is all it means. We will turn this particular thing over. We will not send these men 1,500 miles away to seek labor elsewhere. But in the language of the section we will simply utilize this labor and this material where they are for shipbuilding. That is all it says.

Now, I am not going to say anything more about the construction of this section, but I am going to say just one word in concluding. I have read this proposed amendment with the utmost care. I have compared it so far as I have been able to do with the Senate amendment, and I want to say that the House amendment has been drawn with infinitely more care and more skill, and I can not pay too high a compliment to the gentleman who prepared it on his skill and great care in preparing it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, which amendment would have read as follows:

Provided, That not less than 400 wooden ships of standard size and approximately 3,000 net tons each be constructed hereunder.

But I am not at this late hour going to embarrass the committee and precipitate a fight by offering it. I did want to express this thought, however, that there have been a great many conflicting statements made touching the policy of the Shipping Board and Gen. Goethals in the building of wooden ships. When the question first arose we were led to believe they were going to contract to build a thousand wooden ships. Then it changed to 200. Now the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] quotes Gen. Goethals to the effect that he is going to let what few that are to be built on lump-sum bids, and I imagine in the end they will decide to construct no wooden ships at all. I am sorry that differences have arisen in the shipbuilding program, and I hope that whatever differences may have existed between the Shipping Board and Gen. Goethals heretofore touching the construction of wooden ships or steel ships have now been smoothed out, and that contracts will be let at once for the building of these wooden ships, so that we can get them immediately.

There is no question that you can build a wooden ship more quickly than a steel ship. It may be that after you have the patterns and the steel plates standardized you can construct a steel ship quicker than a wooden ship, but there is no question, and can not be any question, that you can build wooden ships for immediate use much quicker than you can build steel ships. I know that men have come from my district who are competent to build ships, and they tendered their yards to the Government four or five weeks ago. They were ready to commence construction at once, but up to this good hour they have been unable to obtain the contracts. I do hope that something will be done, so that we can get immediate results, and that can only be accomplished by letting out contracts for the construction of wooden as well as steel ships. Let me urge Gen. Goethals, as well as the Shipping Board, to bury any differences that may exist and get busy and build ships. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in Senate amendment numbered 2 with the Fitzgerald amendment.

The Senate amendment numbered 2 with the Fitzgerald amendment was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the conferees: Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. GILLETT.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 29, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee, we trust, with an ever-increasing sense of our dependence upon Thee. As time moves on with its ever-increasing purpose it has brought us face to face with problems which test and try all the capacity of human life. We pray that in the unity of our spirit and counsel we may have the assurance that we are being led on by the great God of our fathers. Do Thou give to us the sense of security and peace that comes only when we put our trust in Thee. Guide us in the discharge of the duties of this day. We humbly ask, for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PROPOSED TAX ON DOGS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

BUCK GROVE, IOWA, May 26, 1917.

To the UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIRS: If your respected body would care to raise a large amount of revenue and at the same time add, indirectly, to the food supply of the country, while at the same time inflicting no hardships on anyone, tax dogs. Put a tax of $5 a head on all boy dogs and $25 on each female dog. This is not a high tax for a luxury, which a dog is, to a vast majority of owners. To avoid the tax hundreds of thousands of the brutes would be killed, and that is where the saving of food would come in.

Twenty million is, I believe, a conservative estimate of the number of dogs in the United States. They will weigh, on an average, 30 pounds each, perhaps more. A dog of this size will consume as much food as the average human. Besides this loss, hundreds of thousands of sheep are annually slaughtered by dogs, and at frequent intervals a human life is sacrificed. All the dogs in the world are not worth one human life.

Pass a national law requiring that all dogs be taxed, and that, the tax having been paid, the animal shall wear a collar with a small jingling bell attached, and that any dog running at large without the bell may be killed by anyone on sight.

Respectfully, A. F. BONNEY.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wondered why it was not proposed in this letter to use dogs for sausage and thus help along the general cause of conserving food. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CADETS AT MILITARY ACADEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of the 23d instant, which will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

MAY 26, 1917.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution No. 67, of May 23, 1917, in which the Secretary of War is directed to furnish to the Senate as soon as possible certain information concerning the appointment and admission of cadets to the United States Military Academy, I beg leave to report as follows:

1. The total number of cadets in the Military Academy at West Point, and number from each State.

The total number of cadets in the Military Academy, including 3 foreigners, is 554. These cadets are apportioned among the States and Territories, the District of Columbia, the United States at large, the Philippine Islands, "honor schools," the National Guard, the Army, and foreign countries, as follows:

Alabama	13
Alaska	1
Arizona	2
Arkansas	6
California	19
Colorado	7
Connecticut	8
Delaware	2
District of Columbia	2

Hawaii	0

Iowa	15
Kansas	6
Kentucky	9
Louisiana	10
Maine	7
Maryland	8
Massachusetts	20

Virginia	17
Washington	5
West Virginia	6
Wisconsin	10
Wyoming	3
United States at large	40
Honor schools	3
National Guard	9
Regular Army	3
Cuba	1

The admission of the 339 qualified candidates in June will bring the total number of cadets on the rolls up to 893. It should be noted, however, that the class of 1918, with 154 members, is to be graduated on August 30 next. The admission in August next of 7 ex-cadets will bring the total number up to 739 for the beginning of the academic year in September.

2. The total number of cadets that were to have been appointed under the examination held March 19, 1917, and the States from which they were to be appointed.

The act of Congress approved May 4, 1916, authorized an increase in the Corps of Cadets and specified that that increase should be divided into four annual increments, as nearly equal as practicable, and equitably distributed among the sources from which appointments to the Military Academy are authorized. Under this provision of the law the total number of cadets that can be admitted to the academy next June from all sources is 449, and it was believed that if every Senator and Representative who would have only one cadet after the graduation of the class of 1917 were invited to nominate candidates for examination in March, 1917, and that if nominations were also requested for all vacancies from the Army, the National Guard, the United States at large, and "honor schools," about the number needed to make up the total allowed by law would be obtained and that the cadets would be equitably distributed over the sources from which appointments are authorized. Consequently invitations to nominate candidates for examination last March were sent as follows:

Arizona	4
Arkansas	12
California	7
Colorado	5
Connecticut	5
District of Columbia	1
Georgia	13
Hawaii	2
Idaho	2
Illinois	33
Iowa	10
Kansas	13
Kentucky	16
Louisiana	10
Maine	5
Maryland	8
Massachusetts	15
Michigan	16
Minnesota	14
Mississippi	14
Missouri	22
Nebraska	8
Nevada	4
New Hampshire	4
New Jersey	13
New Mexico	1
New York	46
North Carolina	12
North Dakota	7
Ohio	23
Oklahoma	10
Oregon	5
Pennsylvania	36
Philippine Islands	1
Rhode Island	6
South Carolina	9
South Dakota	6
Utah	5
Vermont	5
Virginia	7
Washington	9
West Virginia	10
Wisconsin	15
Wyoming	3
United States at large	16
Honor schools	7

3. The number of cadets to be appointed as the result of the examination of March 19, 1917, and the number of vacancies remaining by reason of the failures in said examination and the States in which such vacancies occur.

As a result of the entrance examination held last March, 339 candidates are to be admitted to the Military Academy next June. There are 15 cases pending owing to sickness. These candidates are to report at West Point in June for examination and for admission if qualified. Under the act of Congress, mentioned above, only 1,000 cadets can be on the rolls July 1, 1917. By deducting 893 from this number it will be seen that there are only 107 actual vacancies, 65 of which are from the Regular Army, the National Guard, and "honor schools," leaving only 42 vacancies from the States and Territories. As it was necessary to send out more invitations than there were actual vacancies it will also be seen that it is impracticable to apportion these 42 vacancies.

4. The time within which such vacancies must be filled.

Invitations will be extended to Senators and Representatives in the course of a few weeks to nominate candidates for the examination to be held beginning on the third Tuesday in March, 1918, with a view to admission to the Military Academy in June, 1918. These invitations will be sent to all Senators and Representatives who will not have two cadets in June, 1918, and the nominations must be made before the third Tuesday in March, 1918.

5. If such vacancies are not to be filled until next year, why not?

Owing to the crowded condition of the Military Academy, the present facilities of which will be taxed to the utmost, and to the difficulty of obtaining competent instructors for the large number of new cadets, it is deemed to be inadvisable to hold another entrance examination this year, except for those nominees who were prevented by sickness or other unavoidable cause from reporting for the March examination.

6. Have examinations at the time of annual entrance into the academy been discontinued? If so, why and when were they discontinued?

Examination at the time of annual entrance into the Military Academy in June has been discontinued. Up to the year 1892 the entrance examination was held in June of each year, but in that year it was changed to March and April. It was later decided to be advisable to hold only one entrance examination annually, and January was designated as the month in which it should be held; but it has since been put back to the third Tuesday in March, which has been found to be the most practicable time for it. The only other entrance examination provided for by the regulations is one at West Point in June for nominees who may be prevented by sickness or other unavoidable cause from reporting for the regular examination in March.

7. Why are not entrance examinations provided this year for filling the vacancies caused by failures in the March 19 examinations?

This question seems to be answered by the answer to question No. 5.

8. What is the full capacity of the Military Academy?

The full capacity of the Military Academy with its present facilities is 770 cadets.

Very respectfully.

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Albert Hilliard, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate No. 2 to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; disagrees to the residue of the amendments of the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. GILLETT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the petition of Carl C. Proper, of Des Moines, Iowa, favoring the proposed 2 per cent tax on advertising receipts and remonstrating against the proposed increase of postal rates on second-class matter, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a communication from the governor of the State of Kansas, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, as it relates to a very material matter regarding pending legislation.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF KANSAS,
Topeka, May 26, 1917.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHERMAN: The publishers of the United States are patriotic and are willing to pay their full share of the national war tax. But I beg to submit that the increase of second-class postage as now included in the House bill is so greatly in excess of what the industry can bear that it will not only fail as a revenue measure but would completely demoralize a business already in a chaotic condition owing to the abnormal and excessive cost of white paper.

Taking my own publications as an illustration, I find that the increase of second-class postage under the House measure is about 350 per cent, despite the fact that my printing plant is situated near the geographical center of the country. I paid in second-class postage in 1916 a sum nearly equal to the net profits of my business; so that the proposed tax will absorb 250 per cent of my net profits. My business last year netted 6½ per cent on the turnover, and there is no possible way of passing on this increased expense; subscriptions are already paid, advertising contracts are already made, and before a readjustment could be effected hundreds of well-established publications would be compelled to suspend publication. I do not exaggerate when I say that the proposed measure means the wiping out of an immense industry.

If there was ever a time when the Nation needed the help and influence of the agricultural press in speeding up food production, that time is now. To cripple it would be fatal error; the tax proposed by the House would practically annihilate it.

I am sure publishers as a class, do not seek to evade taxation. We want to do our share; we are willing to contribute our profits, if need be, to the righteous cause in which the Nation is engaged, as recommended by the Senate Finance Committee; but in the larger interests of the Nation, in accord with every economic principle, we beg you to allow the industry to live, and, in the language of our President, "be made more prolific and more efficient than ever."

I therefore respectfully urge careful consideration of this very serious condition.

Respectfully, yours, ARTHUR CAPPER.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I present a copy of a resolution passed by a joint meeting that was held on the 21st of May, 1917, at Shoshone, Idaho, consisting of the County Commissioners and the War Production Committee of Lincoln County, Idaho, calling upon Congress to take some action that will tend to relieve the situation relative to farm labor in that community. I also present a letter of transmission written by Mr. Paul S. Haddock, of Shoshone, Idaho, who was chairman of the meeting. These resolutions and the letter of transmittal very fully explain a very unfortunate condition that exists not only in Lincoln County, Idaho, but in the entire West relative to the labor situation.

It is impossible for the farmers of the West to secure sufficient help to properly farm the fields they now have under cultivation. The Government is calling upon the farmers for patriotic reasons to plant additional crops in order to relieve the food situation. If the farmers are going to put in additional crops, or are going to be able to farm the land that they now have under cultivation, it will be necessary for the Government to take some immediate and specific action that will enable them to secure farm labor. The farmers of the West are ready and willing to pay fair and equitable wages, but they do not propose to be held up and forced to pay unreasonable wages. I believe it is just as necessary to take some immediate action that will enable the farmers of this country to secure help upon their farms as it is to secure soldiers for the firing line.

I ask that the letter and the accompanying resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHOSHONE, IDAHO, May 21, 1917.

Hon. JAMES H. BRADY,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing a resolution which was adopted to-day by a joint session of the county commissioners and our war production committee of this county in regard to the farm-labor situation.

We do not desire to have this resolution construed in any sense as a complaint on the part of the farmers and business men of this community, because they all realize that every citizen must put up with more or less hardship during the period of the war, and I wish to assure you that the farmers of Lincoln County are as loyal and patriotic and will be as little given to grumbling as any set of citizens that can be found in the United States. On the other hand, they feel that they can not do their full duty in the way of producing food supplies under the present labor conditions.

It has been suggested by some leading farmers of the community that even if no immediate relief can be had in the way of importation of Chinese labor, etc., still a movement along that line would have a beneficial effect upon the farm laborers by calling the fact to their attention that in case they attempt to hold up the farmers and compel them to pay exorbitant wages that in the long run they themselves will be the sufferers.

It is not the desire of the committee to urge you to support any given legislation, or to attempt to advise you as to what steps, if any, it would be best for the Federal Government to take, but simply to call your attention to this situation and ask your assistance along any lines you might think proper.

Yours, respectfully,

PAUL S. HADDOCK.

Resolution.

That whereas a joint meeting was held on the 21st day of May, 1917, at Shoshone, Idaho, by and between the board of county commissioners of Lincoln County, Idaho, and the war-production committee of said county, and that said meeting was called for the purpose of devising ways and means for procuring more farm laborers to assist in the irrigation, cultivation, and harvesting of the farm crops of said Lincoln County; and

Whereas after hearing reports from numerous well-posted farmers from said county and after a full and complete discussion of the subject, it was the sense of said meeting that a very great and grave danger is now threatening not only the crops of Lincoln County but also the crops all over southern Idaho by reason of the fact that there are not sufficient farm laborers available for the proper handling of the crops in question; that a large number of the farmers of this county are at the present time suffering for a lack of help and that as soon as irrigation season gets under way it will be utterly impossible for many of the crops to be saved without additional help. That owing to the scarcity of farm laborers their wages have been rapidly increasing, and many of the farm laborers are taking advantage of the absolute necessity of the farmers to secure exorbitant wages, much in excess of the amount the farmers are justified in paying for such help, and that there is a constant demand for still further increase in said wages. That by reason of said conditions there is a feeling of unrest on the part of the farm laborer for fear that he may not be obtaining as much money as some other farmer in another part of the community is paying. Under such fluctuating prices it is a common occurrence for the farm laborer to leave his employer without notice, in the almost certain belief that he can obtain at least as much, if not more, from some one else.

The more serious result of the above condition is that the substantial farmers who have a considerable area under cultivation are placed upon such an uncertain basis that they dare not go further along the line of additional food production, and that although the farmers of this community have loyally answered President Wilson's and Gov. Alexander's call in using their utmost endeavor to obtain a large food production during the war, their energies along this line will prove a detriment rather than a benefit unless some action is taken to relieve the scarcity of farm labor in this vicinity.

It was also the sense of said meeting that steps should be taken by the Federal Government to aid the farming vicinity of the country, and especially the irrigated section of southern Idaho, in procuring men to work on the farms and, although no recommendation was definitely made, two plans were suggested at said meeting, one being that a draft of the idle men of the country be made for farm laborers, to be organized and under the direction of the Federal authorities, and that their wages should be fixed at some reasonable figure; that anyone so drafted who refused to so work should then be drafted into the army and sent to the front. The second suggestion was that a sufficient number of Chinese be imported into the country to supply the temporary shortage of help during the period of the war.

It was the further sense of the meeting that the farm-labor conditions of the country are gradually growing worse and will continue to grow worse, as more and more men join the Army, and unless relief is given along these lines it will be impossible for the farmers in southern Idaho to perform the full amount of service along the lines of food supply that they might otherwise be able to produce: Wherefore, be it

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress be requested to take any action which, in their judgment, they might deem to be to the best interest for the purpose of procuring an adequate supply of farm laborers for southern Idaho, and that the governor and the other State officials of Idaho be requested to assist in any movement along this line that may to them seem practical; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress and a copy to the governor of the State of Idaho.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS,
[SEAL.] By J. W. LUNDIN, Clerk.
WAR PRODUCTION COMMITTEE,
By PAUL S. HADDOCK, Chairman.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Germantown, Philadelphia, and vicinity, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the immediate enactment of prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors as a measure of food conservation and for the immediate prohibition of the sale of liquors for beverage purposes, in order to conserve the health, wealth, labor, transport facilities, and military efficiency of the people, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of the county of San Miguel, in the State of New Mexico, offering all support in their power in the prosecution of the war, and also a letter of transmittal from O. A. Larrazolo, chairman of the meeting. I ask that the letter and accompanying resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter and resolution were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAS VEGAS, N. MEX., May 17, 1917.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The citizens of San Miguel County held a mass meeting at the courthouse in Las Vegas last night (May 16) and unanimously passed the resolution a copy of which I am inclosing for your information.

I can not tell exactly how many people were present (among whom there were several ladies), but you know our district court room, and it was crowded, and a great many people, finding no seats, remained standing up.

The people in our section of the State are quite enthusiastic in their determination to give all support in their power in the prosecution of the war, as well as by the voluntary enlistment in the National Guard, as by the stay-at-home element, who are going to till every inch of the soil that they possibly can, and I can say with all assurance that the people of New Mexico will do their full share in this matter.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

O. A. LARRAZOLO,
Chairman of Meeting.

Resolution.

We, the citizens of the county of San Miguel, in the State of New Mexico, in mass meeting assembled at Las Vegas, N. Mex., this 16th day of May, A. D. 1917, do hereby make known and declare that we are in favor of the passage by the Federal Congress of a law making it compulsory to give military training to the youth of the Nation, and we hereby request of our representatives in both Chambers of the National Congress to give their support to any law that may have that object in view.

Mr. POMERENE. I present memorials from sundry labor organizations, signed by the presidents and secretaries of the local organizations, remonstrating against the enactment of a national prohibition law. It is stated that they represent a membership of 2,027,147. I move that the memorials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. The National Association of State Universities held a meeting in this city a few days ago, when they adopted patriotic resolutions, in which they state that:

The State universities, believing that they represent the spirit and sentiment of their several States, are ready to put all their institutional resources, material and human, at the disposal of the National Government in the service of the country for the entire period of the war which our Nation has entered.

I send the resolutions to the desk and ask to have them printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the National Association of State Universities, meeting in Washington, D. C., May 4, 1917.

The National Association of State Universities, in special meeting assembled, announces that the State universities, believing that they represent the spirit and sentiment of their several States, are ready to put all their institutional resources—material and human—at the disposal of the National Government in the service of the country for the entire period of the war upon which our Nation has entered.

This declaration of patriotic purpose is made without any reservation whatsoever, and means that the State universities, as public institutions, are to be used to the utmost limit of their possibilities in faculties and equipment for the preparation of efficient soldiers, for the training of skilled educational, scientific, technical, and professional workers, and for the conduct of all scientific instructions that may aid in the successful prosecution of the war.

Therefore the President of the United States and his advisors, and the Congress, are hereby notified that the State universities of America are willing to undertake to readjust their curricula and to rearrange all their activities, in time and content, so far as may be necessary to bring to ultimate triumph the righteous conflict for universal democracy.

It is the further sense of this association that the people whom our institutions represent and serve have a profound feeling of loyalty to our common country and of readiness to sacrifice for its best interests.

That in accordance therewith they urgently desire that the results of their effort and self-denial in the production and consumption of food supplies be not wasted in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors during the war, and that prompt and effective measures be taken to maintain the honor of the Army and Navy and to protect the ancient reputation for decency and manliness by taking such steps as may be necessary to protect them from the presence of vice and from the peril of venereal and other diseases in training camp and field.

GUY PORTER BENTON, President.
FRANK L. MCVEY, Secretary.

Mr. PAGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Morrisville and Irasburg, in the State of Vermont, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Miami, Fla., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government has requested the conservation of food supply throughout this country; and
Whereas to properly preserve fruit and vegetables it is necessary to put them up in tin cans, glass jars, and other containers; and
Whereas the price of tin cans, glass jars, and other containers is increasing daily, and is working a hardship upon the people of this country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Miami Chamber of Commerce request the United States Department of Agriculture to investigate this matter and take steps to protect the interests of the people of our country by having the price of food containers fixed at a certain reasonable sum as the maximum price thereof for all tin cans, glass jars, and other containers that can be hermetically sealed to preserve vegetables, fruits, and meats, and liquids, the size of which containers shall range from 1 pint to 2 gallons; and be it further

Resolved, That we recommend that such containers be manufactured under compulsion at the price fixed by the United States Government, if such action be necessary to protect the food supply of this country.

Adopted by the Miami Chamber of Commerce, Miami, Fla.

Mr. FRANCE presented memorials of the congregation of the Homestead Methodist Episcopal Church, of Baltimore, and of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the taxing of and praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors during the war, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MCCUMBER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fargo, Page, Stanton, Westhope, and Larimore, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquors, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of the Merchants' Association of Montevideo, and of sundry citizens of Northome, Jackson, St. Paul, and Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maryland, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Westminster, Sudlersville, and Damascus, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into intoxicating liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of California relative to the needy Indians within the State of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 9, relating to needy Indians within the State of California.

Whereas there are within the borders of the State of California approximately 4,000 Indians without permanent homes, without any or adequate school facilities, and a considerable number of them without necessary food, shelter, and medical attendance; and
Whereas the massing of these Indians in certain thinly populated districts makes provision for them at the expense of their white neighbors under the prevalent school and pauper laws of the State an unfair, inequitable, and intolerable burden; and
Whereas while it has been the general policy of the National Government to assume the care of Indians, yet it has not always been practicable or for the best interest of the Indians themselves to remove them to reservations; and
Whereas the general policy of State and National cooperation, as outlined by the Indian board of cooperation of California, has been already approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by our Representatives in Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That our Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, memorialized to attempt to secure provision in the Indian appropriation bill (1) for the purchase of adequate and permanent allotments with necessary improvements for homeless Indians; (2) for providing school buildings and equipment for Indians in districts where their numbers and the necessities demand it; and (3) for cooperation with county officials in securing proper care for sick and destitute Indians, until the necessity therefore no longer exists.

Adopted in senate March 21, 1917.

CLIFTON E. BROOKS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly April 23, 1917.

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of California relative to the devoting of revenues from national forests to the construction of works for flood control, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 7, relative to the devoting of revenues from national forests to the construction of works for flood control.

Whereas the streams and rivers of California are subject to destructive floods, entailing great loss of property and life; and

Whereas the sources of most of said streams are in national forest reserves wholly within the State of California and contain vast quantities of timber, estimated to amount to more than 94,000,000,000 feet, and all of which is exempt from taxation by the State and may not at present be made use of by her people; and

Whereas the Government obtains large revenues from said forests, only a lesser portion of which is returned to or expended in the State: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and assembly jointly, That the Legislature of California does hereby recommend to the Senators and Representatives of the State in Congress to use their best endeavors to secure the setting aside of all revenues derived from national forest reserves in the State not required for the administrative cost thereof to create a fund for the construction of dams and other works for the control of floods in streams subject to destructive floods in the State of California.

Adopted in senate April 20, 1917.

CLIFTON E. BROOKS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly April 27, 1917.

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of California relative to the construction of a military highway along the Pacific coast from the Canadian border to the Mexican border, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 6, relative to the construction and maintenance of a military highway along the Pacific coast from the Canadian border to the Mexican border.

Whereas the building and maintaining of a military highway along the Pacific coast from the Canadian border to the Mexican border would be of the greatest benefit to the United States Government and to the States on the Pacific coast in supplying coast forts with guns and ammunition, and in the handling of artillery and ammunition; and

Whereas such a highway would be of incalculable benefit in mobilizing troops in the event of an attempted invasion, and all other incidents appertaining thereto; and

Whereas the people of the Pacific Coast States realize the necessity of such a highway and urgently request the building and maintaining of such a highway: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate and the assembly jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the Congress of the United States to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the building and maintaining of such a highway, and to make an appropriation of sufficient size to carry out said work; and be it further

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California be requested to use all honorable means to secure the action desired in this matter for the purpose aforesaid; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California, including those to assume office on March 4, 1917.

Adopted in senate February 28, 1917.

CLIFTON E. BROOKS,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly April 25, 1917.

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Central Labor Council of Oakland, Cal., remonstrating against the admission of oriental labor into this country, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REBUILDING RUSSIAN RAILROADS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I send to the desk a very short article, that I ask to have read, upon the subject of rebuilding Russian railroads and financing their reconstruction through the National Council of Defense. I have no comment to make upon it; but I was just wondering when we passed legislation to put the responsibility upon the National Council of Defense to rebuild Russian railroads. I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES TO OUTFIT RUSSIAN ROADS—DEFENSE COUNCIL ASKS BIDS ON 10,000 CARS.

The National Council of Defense has definitely undertaken the purchase of railroad equipment for the Russian Government. This was indicated by the receipt yesterday of letters from the council sent to leading equipment builders asking for their terms for the construction of 10,000 freight cars of 1,200 "poods" (43,200 pounds) capacity and 300 Decapod locomotives.

Car companies which, it is stated, are to receive orders are the American Car & Foundry Co., Pressed Steel, Standard Steel, Pullman, and the Bettendorf Cos. It was also learned that the Barney & Smith Car Co., the Harlan & Hollingsworth Co., and the Seattle Car & Foundry Co. were to receive contracts later on, as the Russian Government desires a total of 40,000 freight cars.

Financing of these purchases is to be done by the Defense Council through the recent loan of $100,000,000 to Russia.

The builders were informed that the council desired to have all details settled so that work can be started as soon as the commission reports.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator where that article is from?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a news clipping that I found in one of the New York papers, and I just felt that it might be valuable information, it seemed to me so definitely stated. I do not know whether it is true, but it is the most definite information I have seen about what is being done with the $100,000,000 appropriation, and as it was interesting to me I thought it might interest others.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he thinks that if the Government of the United States is furnishing freight cars to the railroads of Russia it would not afford some sort of justification for furnishing some for our own use?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have accomplished in part my desire in having the article read by bringing out the question of the Senator from Missouri. What I have upon my own mind is that if we are assuming responsibility for the reorganization of the railroads of Russia, we might perhaps induce some attention to the improvement of the railroads of the United States through Government loans.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Georgia whether this article may not only mean that the National Defense Council are expending the $100,000,000 that this country gave to Russia, and doing it as a mere matter of assistance in the disbursement of the money by the purchase of railway material in this country? That was the impression the article made on me when I read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I really do not know what it means. I do not know whether the representatives of the Russian Government who received the $100,000,000 are authorized to make arrangements with American organizations for its use.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me? Does not the Senator from Georgia regard Russia as our ally in this war?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope so.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not material that Russia shall be in a position to maintain herself on the eastern front in order that we may be successful on the western front?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is very desirable, though I can not conceive that it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the intimation the Senator intends to convey is taking a narrow view of the subject. We need the help of Russia in this war to be successful. It retains some sixty or seventy German divisions on that line. The Russians have been handicapped by lack of transportation, by getting foodstuffs, and by getting ammunition. If we are interested in the prosecution of this war that is one way to help it along, and it is just as material for our success as it is to send troops over to Europe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator takes an incorrect view when he says that my view is narrow. Instead of being a narrow view I was endeavoring to develop a broader view. My suggestion was, that if we were engaged in reconstructing the railroads of Russia our own railroads might also come in for some consideration which would insure the public necessary transportation.

Mr. NELSON. With the 15 per cent increase they can rehabilitate the roads in this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was to broaden rather than to narrow activities that I presented the article. I have before shown the objection to the 15 per cent increase.

COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1836) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the middle judicial district of the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2371) empowering the Supreme Court of the United States to promulgate uniform rules for preparing and printing the records for all appellate courts and to fix fees and charges in connection therewith; and

A bill (S. 2372) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and as amended thereafter; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 2373) to authorize the President, on recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to accept lands donated to the United States as refuges for wild-game animals and wild birds, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2374) to relieve the estate of Thomas H. Hall, deceased, late postmaster at Panacea, Fla., and the bondsmen of said Thomas H. Hall, of the payment of money alleged to have been misappropriated by a clerk in said office; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 2375) for the relief of Reuben R. Hunter; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2376) granting a pension to James A. Coyne (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 71) to suspend, during the present war with Germany, the requirement that not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year on each mining claim for all owners who, in lieu of such assessment work, expend the sum of $100 in money or in labor in the raising or manufacturing of products necessary for the maintenance of the Army, Navy, or people of the United States; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

RETIRED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is very brief, and it is quite important that it should have immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 70) relating to the service of certain retired officers of the Army was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That when retired officers of the Army, any portion of whose active service was in the Corps of Engineers, are called back into active service, they shall be eligible to fill any position required by law to be filled by an officer of the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will explain very briefly what is desired to be accomplished by this joint resolution. It embodies what is contained in a bill, which has already been reported to the Senate, being Senate bill 1786, which was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and has since been favorably reported by him. The joint resolution embodies section 14 of that bill. The purpose of the resolution is to make it possible for the Engineer Corps of the Army to detail for service retired engineers who could perform just as effective service in engineering works as the younger men are now performing. It is necessary to send the younger engineers to service in Europe.

To illustrate, Col. Townsend, the president of the Mississippi River Commission, has been designated to take a regiment of Engineers to France. It is desired to replace him with Gen. Bixby, formerly Chief of Engineers. Gen. Mackenzie, also formerly Chief of Engineers, is, I understand, to be sent to the St. Paul-Minneapolis district, and a number of retired Engineer officers are to be sent to river and harbor works in different parts of the country. The law does not permit it now.

This matter has been acted upon by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the acting chairman of that committee, to explain it briefly. It has been before his committee, and, as I have said, has been acted upon favorably.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has correctly stated the matter so far as the Military Affairs Committee is concerned. The committee some time ago considered a revision of the general defense act and reported a bill, which is now upon the calendar, but which has not yet been reached for consideration. One provision of that bill was section 14, which is identical with the joint resolution which the Senator from Louisiana has now introduced. Section 14 was inserted on the recommendation of the War Department to enable the assignment of old, retired Army officers for engineer work in this country, in order that the young men might be sent to the front for more active service.

I can see no possible objection to putting this joint resolution through at this time, although the bill which is now on the calendar will not be reached until after the return of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who has gone to his own State on public business.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I will state that I am asking for the consideration and passage of the joint resolution at this time on the request of the War Department. It is very anxious to have many works go on, and they would be expedited if the joint resolution is promptly acted upon. No one raises any objection to it. It is simply for the purpose of utilizing retired officers, which the department can not do under the law as it now stands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, ordinarily, of course, the joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs and be reported from that committee. If that committee were going to meet to-day, I should very much prefer to have the joint resolution take that course; but on the explanation of the acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and the statement which has been made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] I see no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. STONE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO SENATORS.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 75), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That each Senator is hereby authorized to employ an additional clerk for the remainder of the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress at the rate of $4 per diem, said compensation to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY HON. ELIHU ROOT.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I offer a brief address by Hon. Elihu Root as president of the American Bar Association, entitled "Public Service by the Bar." It is an address delivered at the American Bar Association held in Chicago at its annual meeting August 30, 1916. I have received a request from the bar association that it be printed as a public document. I ask leave to introduce it and have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 37).

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit the conference report on the bill H. R. 291, known as the espionage bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"TITLE I.

"ESPIONAGE.

"SECTION 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense with intent or reason to believe that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, enters, flies over, or otherwise obtains information concerning any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station, submarine base, coaling station, fort, battery, torpedo station, dockyard, canal, railroad, arsenal, camp, factory, mine, telegraph, telephone, wireless, or signal station, building, office, or other place connected with the national defense, owned or constructed, or in progress of construction by the United States or under the control of the United States, or of any of its officers or agents, or within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, or any place in which any vessel, aircraft, arms, munitions, or other materials or instruments for use in time of war are being made, prepared, repaired, or stored, under any contract or agreement with the United States, or with any person on behalf of the United States, or

"SEC. 2. (a) Whoever, with intent or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation, communicates, delivers, or transmits, or attempts to, or aids or induces another to, communicate, deliver, or transmit, to any foreign government, or to any faction or party or military or naval force within a foreign country, whether recognized or unrecognized by the United States, or to any representative, officer, agents, employee, subject, or citizen thereof, either directly or indirectly, any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, map, model, note, instrument, appliance, or information relating to the national defense, shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years: Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of subsection (a) of this section in time of war shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not more than 30 years; and (b) whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense, which might be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.

"SEC. 3. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause or attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty, in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States, to the injury of the service or of the United States, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both.

"SEC. 4. When the United States is at war, the publishing willfully of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which information is useful to the enemy, is hereby prohibited; and the President may from time to time by proclamation declare the character of such above-described information which in his opinion is not useful to the enemy, and thereupon it shall be lawful to publish the same. In any prosecution hereunder the jury trying the cause shall determine not only whether the defendant did willfully publish such information but also whether such information was of such character as to be useful to the enemy: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same, if such discussion, comment, or criticism does not disclose information herein prohibited.

"Whoever violates this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 5. If two or more persons conspire to violate the provisions of sections 2 or 3 of this title, and one or more of such persons does any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be punished as in said sections provided in the case of the doing of the act the accomplishment of which is the object of such conspiracy. Except as above provided conspiracies to commit offenses under this title shall be punished as provided by section 37 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States approved March 4, 1909.

"SEC. 6. Whoever harbors or conceals any person who he knows, or has reasonable grounds to believe or suspect, has committed, or is about to commit, an offense under this title shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 7. The President in time of war or in case of national emergency may by proclamation designate any place other than those set forth in subsection (a) of section 1 hereof in which anything for the use of the Army or Navy is being prepared or constructed or stored as a prohibited place for the purposes of this title: Provided, That he shall determine that information with respect thereto would be prejudicial to the national defense.

"SEC. 8. Nothing contained in this title shall be deemed to limit the jurisdiction of the general courts-martial, military commissions, or naval courts-martial under sections 1342, 1343, and 1624 of the Revised Statutes as amended.

"SEC. 9. The provisions of this title shall extend to all territories, possessions, and places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States whether or not contiguous thereto, and offenses under this title when committed upon the high seas or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and outside the territorial limits thereof shall be punishable hereunder.

"SEC. 10. The act entitled 'An act to prevent the disclosure of national-defense secrets,' approved March 3, 1911, is hereby repealed.

"TITLE II.

"VESSELS IN PORTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"SECTION 1. Whenever the President by proclamation or Executive order declares a national emergency to exist by reason of actual or threatened war, insurrection, or invasion, or disturbance or threatened disturbance of the international relations of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury may make, subject to the approval of the President, rules and regulations governing the anchorage and movement of any vessel, foreign or domestic, in the territorial waters of the United States, may inspect such vessel at any time, place guards thereon, and, if necessary in his opinion in order to secure such vessels from damage or injury, or to prevent damage or injury to any harbor or waters of the United States, or to secure the observance of the rights and obligations of the United States, may take, by and with the consent of the President, for such purposes, full possession and control of such vessel and remove therefrom the officers and crew thereof and all other persons not specially authorized by him to go or remain on board thereof.

"Within the territory and waters of the Canal Zone the Governor of the Panama Canal, with the approval of the President, shall exercise all the powers conferred by this section on the Secretary of the Treasury.

"SEC. 2. If any owner, agent, master, officer, or person in charge, or any member of the crew of any such vessel fails to comply with any regulation or rule issued or order given by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Governor of the Panama Canal under the provisions of this title, or obstructs or interferes with the exercise of any power conferred by this title, the vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture to the United States in the same manner as merchandise is forfeited for violation of the customs revenue laws; and the person guilty of such failure, obstruction, or interference shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 3. It shall be unlawful for the owner or master or any other person in charge or command of any private vessel, foreign or domestic, or for any member of the crew or other person, within the territorial waters of the United States, willfully to cause or permit the destruction or injury of such vessel or knowingly to permit said vessel to be used as a place of resort for any person conspiring with another or preparing to commit any offense against the United States, or in violation of the treaties of the United States or of the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, or to defraud the United States, or knowingly to permit such vessels to be used in violation of the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations; and in case such vessel shall be so used, with the knowledge of the owner or master or other person in charge or command thereof, the vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture to the United States in the same manner as merchandise is forfeited for violation of the customs revenue laws; and whoever violates this section shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 4. The President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of this title.

"TITLE III.

"INJURING VESSELS ENGAGED IN FOREIGN COMMERCE.

"SECTION 1. Whoever shall set fire to any vessel of foreign registry, or any vessel of American registry entitled to engage in commerce with foreign nations, or to any vessel of the United States as defined in section 310 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' or to the cargo of the same, or shall tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of such vessel, or shall place bombs or explosives in or upon such vessel, or shall do any other act to or upon such vessel while within the jurisdiction of the United States, or, if such vessel is of American registry, while she is on the high sea, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of the vessel or of her cargo, or of persons on board, whether the injury or danger is so intended to take place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or after the vessel shall have departed therefrom; or whoever shall attempt or conspire to do any such acts with such intent, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.

"TITLE IV.

"INTERFERENCE WITH FOREIGN COMMERCE BY VIOLENT MEANS.

"SECTION 1. Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully prevent, interfere with, or obstruct or attempt to prevent, interfere with or obstruct the exportation to foreign countries of articles from the United States by injuring or destroying, by fire or explosives, such articles or the places where they may be while in such foreign commerce, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

"TITLE V.

"ENFORCEMENT OF NEUTRALITY.

"SECTION 1. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, may withhold clearance from or to any vessel, domestic or foreign, which is required by law to secure clearance before departing from port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, or, by service of formal notice upon the owner, master, or person in command or having charge of any domestic vessel not required by law to secure clearances before so departing, to forbid its departure from port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any such vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry fuel, arms, ammunition, men, supplies, dispatches, or information to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a foreign belligerent nation in violation of the laws, treaties, or obligations of the United States under the law of nations; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart.

"SEC. 2. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, may detain any armed vessel owned wholly or in part by American citizens, or any vessel, domestic or foreign (other than one which has entered the ports of the United States as a public vessel), which is manifestly built for warlike purposes or has been converted or adapted from a private vessel to one suitable for warlike use, until the owner or master, or person having charge of such vessel, shall furnish proof satisfactory to the President, or to the person duly authorized by him, that the vessel will not be employed by the said owners, or master, or person having charge thereof, to cruise against or commit or attempt to commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with which the United States is at peace, and that the said vessel will not be sold or delivered to any belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, by them or any of them, within the jurisdiction of the United States, or, having left that jurisdiction, upon the high seas.

"SEC. 3. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to any agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 4. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, in addition to the facts required by sections 4197, 4198, and 4200 of the Revised Statutes to be set out in the masters' and shippers' manifests before clearance will be issued to vessels bound to foreign ports, each of which sections of the Revised Statutes is hereby declared to be and is continued in full force and effect, every master or person having charge or command of any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, before departure of such vessel from port shall deliver to the collector of customs for the district wherein such vessel is then located a statement duly verified by oath, that the cargo or any part of the cargo is or is not to be delivered to other vessels in port or to be transshipped on the high seas and, if it is to be so delivered or transshipped, stating the kind and quantities and the value of the total quantity of each kind of article so to be delivered or transshipped, and the name of the person, corporation, vessel, or government, to whom the delivery or transshipment is to be made; and the owners, shippers, or consignors of the cargo of such vessel shall in the same manner and under the same conditions deliver to the collector like statements under oath as to the cargo or the parts thereof laden or shipped by them, respectively.

"SEC. 5. Whenever it appears that the vessel is not entitled to clearance or whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that the additional statements under oath required in the foregoing section are false, the collector of customs for the district in which the vessel is located may, subject to review by the Secretary of Commerce, refuse clearance to any vessel, domestic or foreign, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, forbid the departure of the vessel from the port or from the jurisdiction of the United States; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for the vessel to depart.

"SEC. 6. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this title, shall take, or attempt or conspire to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 7. Whoever, being a person belonging to the armed land or naval forces of a belligerent nation or belligerent faction of any nation and being interned in the United States, in accordance with the law of nations, shall leave or attempt to leave said jurisdiction, or shall leave or attempt to leave the limits of internment in which freedom of movement has been allowed, without permission from the proper official of the United States in charge, or shall willfully overstay a leave of absence granted by such official, shall be subject to arrest by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by the military or naval authorities thereof, and shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined and safely kept for such period of time as the official of the United States in charge shall direct; and whoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States and subject thereto, shall aid or entice any interned person to escape or attempt to escape from the jurisdiction of the United States, or from the limits of internment prescribed, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"SEC. 8. Section 13 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 13. Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States or of any of its possessions, knowingly begins or sets on foot or provides or prepares a means for or furnishes the money for, or who takes part in, any military or naval expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States is at peace, shall be fined not more than $3,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.'

"SEC. 9. That the President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"SEC. 10. Section 15 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 15. It shall be lawful for the President to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as he may deem necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart from the United States or any of its possessions in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it ought not to remain, and to detain or prevent any foreign vessel from so departing in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it is not entitled to depart.'

"SEC. 11. The joint resolution approved March 4, 1915, 'To empower the President to better enforce and maintain the neutrality of the United States,' and any act or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this title are hereby repealed.

"TITLE VI.

"SEIZURE OF ARMS AND OTHER ARTICLES INTENDED FOR EXPORT.

"SECTION 1. Whenever an attempt is made to export or ship from or take out of the United States, any arms or munitions of war, or other articles, in violation of law, or whenever there shall be known or probable cause to believe that any such arms or munitions of war, or other articles, are being or are intended to be exported, or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, and marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other person duly authorized for the purpose by the President, may seize and detain any articles or munitions of war about to be exported or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, and the vessels or vehicles containing the same, and retain possession thereof until released or disposed of as hereinafter directed. If upon due inquiry as hereinafter provided, the property seized shall appear to have been about to be so unlawfully exported, shipped from, or taken out of the United States, the same shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the person making any seizure under this title to apply, with due diligence, to the judge of the district court of the United States, or to the judge of the United States district court of the Canal Zone, or to the judge of a court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place within which the seizure is made, for a warrant to justify the further detention of the property so seized, which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation showing that there is known or probable cause to believe that the property seized is being or is intended to be exported or shipped from or taken out of the United States in violation of law; and if the judge refuses to issue the warrant, or application therefor is not made by the person making the seizure within a reasonable time, not exceeding 10 days after the seizure, the property shall forthwith be restored to the owner or person from whom seized. If the judge is satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this title and issues his warrant accordingly, then the property shall be detained by the person seizing it until the President, who is hereby expressly authorized so to do, orders it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it is discharged in due course of law on petition of the claimant, or on trial of condemnation proceedings, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 3. The owner or claimant of any property seized under this title may, at any time before condemnation proceedings have been instituted, as hereinafter provided, file his petition for its restoration in the district court of the United States, or the district court of the Canal Zone, or the court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place in which the seizure was made, whereupon the court shall advance the cause for hearing and determination with all possible dispatch, and, after causing notice to be given to the United States attorney for the district and to the person making the seizure, shall proceed to hear and decide whether the property seized shall be restored to the petitioner or forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 4. Whenever the person making any seizure under this title applies for and obtains a warrant for the detention of the property, and (a) upon the hearing and determination of the petition of the owner or claimant restoration is denied, or (b) the owner or claimant fails to file a petition for restoration within 30 days after the seizure, the United States attorney for the district wherein it was seized, upon direction of the Attorney General, shall institute libel proceedings in the United States district court, or the district court of the Canal Zone, or the court of first instance of the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place wherein the seizure was made, against the property for condemnation; and if, after trial and hearing of the issues involved, the property is condemned, it shall be disposed of by sale, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, paid into the Treasury.

"SEC. 5. The proceedings in such summary trials upon the petition of the owner or claimant of the property seized, as well as in the libel cases herein provided for, shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in such libel cases, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States: Provided, That upon the payment of the costs and legal expenses of both the summary trials and the libel proceedings herein provided for, and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond in an amount double the value of the property seized, conditioned that it will not be exported or used or employed contrary to the provisions of this title, the court, in its discretion, may direct that it be delivered to the owners thereof or to the claimants thereof.

"SEC. 6. Except in those cases in which the exportation of arms and munitions of war or other articles is forbidden by proclamation or otherwise by the President, as provided in section 1 of this title, nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with any trade in such commodities, conducted with any foreign port or place wheresoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this title, under the law of nations, or under the treaties or conventions entered into by the United States, or under the laws thereof.

"SEC. 7. Upon payment of the costs and legal expenses incurred in any such summary trial for possession or libel proceedings, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order the release and restoration to the owner or claimant, as the case may be, of any property seized or condemned under the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 8. The President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"TITLE VII.

"CERTAIN EXPORTS IN TIME OF WAR UNLAWFUL.

"SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress. Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

"SEC. 2. Any person who shall export, ship, or take out, or deliver or attempt to deliver for export, shipment, or taking out, any article in violation of this title, or of any regulation or order made hereunder, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and any article so delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, or so attempted to be delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States; and any officer, director, or agent of a corporation who participates in any such violation shall be liable to like fine or imprisonment, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, is about to carry out of the United States any article or articles in violation of the provisions of this title, the collector of customs for the district in which such vessel is located is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to review by the Secretary of Commerce, to refuse clearance to any such vessel, domestic or foreign, for which clearance is required by law, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, to forbid the departure of such vessel from the port, and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this section shall take, or attempt to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her forbidden cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

"TITLE VIII.

"DISTURBANCE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

"SECTION 1. Whoever, in relation to any dispute or controversy between a foreign government and the United States, shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will, or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent of any foreign government, to the injury of the United States, or with a view or intent to influence any measure of or action by the Government of the United States, or any branch thereof, to the injury of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 2. Whoever within the jurisdiction of the United States shall falsely assume or pretend to be a diplomatic or consular, or other official of a foreign Government duly accredited as such to the Government of the United States with intent to defraud such foreign Government or any person, and shall take upon himself to act as such, or in such pretended character shall demand or obtain, or attempt to obtain from any person or from said foreign Government, or from any officer thereof, any money, paper, document, or other thing of value, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whoever, other than a diplomatic or consular officer or attaché, shall act in the United States as an agent of a foreign Government without prior notification to the Secretary of State shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 4. The words 'foreign Government,' as used in this act and in sections 156, 157, 161, 170, 171, 172, 173, and 220 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' shall be deemed to include any government, faction, or body of insurgents within a country with which the United States is at peace, which government, faction, or body of insurgents may or may not have been recognized by the United States as a government.

"TITLE XI.

"SEARCH WARRANTS.

"SECTION 1. A search warrant authorized by this title may be issued by a judge of a United States district court, or by a judge of a State or Territorial court of record, or by a United States commissioner for the district wherein the property sought is located.

"SEC. 2. A search warrant may be issued under this title upon either of the following grounds:

"1. When the property was stolen or embezzled in violation of a law of the United States; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from any house or other place in which it is concealed, or from the possession of the person by whom it was stolen or embezzled, or from any person in whose possession it may be.

"2. When the property was used as the means of committing a felony; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from any house or other place in which it is concealed, or from the possession of the person by whom it was used in the commission of the offense, or from any person in whose possession it may be.

"3. When the property, or any paper, is possessed, controlled, or used in violation of section 22 of this title; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from the person violating said section, or from any person in whose possession it may be, or from any house or other place in which it is concealed.

"SEC. 3. A search warrant can not be issued but upon probable cause, supported by affidavit, naming or describing the person and particularly describing the property and the place to be searched.

"SEC. 4. The judge or commissioner must, before issuing the warrant, examine on oath the complainant and any witness he may produce, and require their affidavits or take their depositions in writing and cause them to be subscribed by the parties making them.

"SEC. 5. The affidavits or depositions must set forth the facts tending to establish the grounds of the application or probable cause for believing that they exist.

"Sec. 6. If the judge or commissioner is thereupon satisfied of the existence of the grounds of the application or that there is probable cause to believe their existence, he must issue a search warrant, signed by him with his name of office, to a civil officer of the United States duly authorized to enforce or assist in enforcing any law thereof, or to a person so duly authorized by the President of the United States, stating the particular grounds or probable cause for its issue and the names of the persons whose affidavits have been taken in support thereof, and commanding him forthwith to search the person or place named, for the property specified, and to bring it before the judge or commissioner.

"Sec. 7. A search warrant may in all cases be served by any of the officers mentioned in its direction, but by no other person, except in aid of the officer on his requiring it, he being present and acting in its execution.

"Sec. 8. The officer may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, or any part of a house, or anything therein, to execute the warrant, if, after notice of his authority and purpose, he is refused admittance.

"Sec. 9. He may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, for the purpose of liberating a person who, having entered to aid him in the execution of the warrant, is detained therein, or when necessary for his own liberation.

"Sec. 10. The judge or commissioner must insert a direction in the warrant that it be served in the daytime, unless the affidavits are positive that the property is on the person or in the place to be searched, in which case he may insert a direction that it be served at any time of the day or night.

"Sec. 11. A search warrant must be executed and returned to the judge or commissioner who issued it within 10 days after its date; after the expiration of this time the warrant, unless executed, is void.

"Sec. 12. When the officer takes property under the warrant, he must give a copy of the warrant together with a receipt for the property taken (specifying it in detail) to the person from whom it was taken by him, or in whose possession it was found; or, in the absence of any person, he must leave it in the place where he found the property.

"SEC. 13. The officer must forthwith return the warrant to the judge or commissioner and deliver to him a written inventory of the property taken, made publicly or in the presence of the person from whose possession it was taken, and of the applicant for the warrant, if they are present, verified by the affidavit of the officer at the foot of the inventory and taken before the judge or commissioner at the time, to the following effect: 'I, R. S., the officer by whom this warrant was executed, do swear that the above inventory contains a true and detailed account of all the property taken by me on the warrant.'

"SEC. 14. The judge or commissioner must thereupon, if required, deliver a copy of the inventory to the person from whose possession the property was taken and to the applicant for the warrant.

"SEC. 15. If the grounds on which the warrant was issued be controverted, the judge or commissioner must proceed to take testimony in relation thereto, and the testimony of each witness must be reduced to writing and subscribed by each witness.

"SEC. 16. If it appears that the property or paper taken is not the same as that described in the warrant or that there is no probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, the judge or commissioner must cause it to be restored to the person from whom it was taken; but if it appears that the property or paper taken is the same as that described in the warrant and that there is probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, then the judge or commissioner shall order the same retained in the custody of the person seizing it or to be otherwise disposed of according to law.

"SEC. 17. The judge or commissioner must annex the affidavits, search warrant, return, inventory, and evidence, and if he has not power to inquire into the offense in respect to which the warrant was issued he must at once file the same, together with a copy of the record of his proceedings, with the clerk of the court having power to so inquire.

"SEC. 18. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any such officer or person in serving or attempting to serve or execute any such search warrant, or shall assault, beat, or wound any such officer or person, knowing him to be an officer or person so authorized, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years.

"SEC. 19. Sections 125 and 126 of the Criminal Code of the United States shall apply to and embrace all persons making oath or affirmation or procuring the same under the provisions of this title, and such persons shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of said sections.

"SEC. 20. A person who maliciously and without probable cause procures a search warrant to be issued and executed shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 21. An officer who in executing a search warrant willfully exceeds his authority, or exercises it with unnecessary severity, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 22. Whoever, in aid of any foreign Government, shall knowingly and willfully have possession of or control over any property or papers designed or intended for use or which is used as the means of violating any penal statute, or any of the rights or obligations of the United States under any treaty or the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 23. Nothing contained in this title shall be held to repeal or impair any existing provisions of law regulating search and the issue of search warrants.

"TITLE XII.

"USE OF MAILS.

"SECTION 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

"Sec. 2. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

"Sec. 3. Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by this title to be nonmailable, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Any person violating any provision of this title may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed, or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 21, the committee proposes——

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if there is not pending a motion to strike out the entire paragraph? That was the motion before the Senate at the time of adjournment last night, I think, it having been made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the paragraph on page 5, after line 16, as follows:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 5 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $6,500,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand, the committee amendment has not yet been voted upon. I take it the paragraph should be perfected before the motion to strike out is made.

Mr. GORE. I suggest that the committee amendment to reduce the amount be first acted on. I am sure the Senator from Tennessee will have no objection.

Mr McKELLAR. Not at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 18, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "two"; and in line 21, after the word "products," to strike out "$6,500,000" and insert "$2,500,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act; the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture; and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $2,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask the Secretary to state the amendment offered by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the amended paragraph on page 5, embraced in lines 17 to 21, inclusive, which has just been read.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday I discussed to some extent this paragraph of the bill, and I need not go over the question again, further than to say this: This paragraph provides—

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act—

And section 2 of the act has this to say:

That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or feed crops, he is authorized to purchase such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers, for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

That ordinarily would be a very good provision, and one to which I would not have any serious objection; but, coming at this time, it seems to me it is wholly unnecessary. If the Secretary proceeds to store seeds at all under this provision of the bill, he must of necessity store last year's seeds. What is he going to do with them? Store them. For what purpose? They can not be planted now, or only a very small portion of them can be planted now. Planting has taken place in practically the entire country, and there is no demand for these additional seeds. If they are to be stored for next year, why save the seeds of last year to plant next year's crops? Have we not plenty of time to do that next year?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, this section of the bill is not designed to provide seeds for this year, the year 1917, only. This measure is supposed to be a war measure; it is designed to subserve purposes growing out of this war; and if the seeds are to be gathered and stored during the present, for use in next year's planting, the work must be done this year, and it must be done before provision can be made for it by Congress in December next.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I disagree entirely with the Senator. I do not believe that the seed of last year will be the best seed to carry over this year to be planted next year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator did not understand me to say anything of that kind, did he?

Mr. MCKELLAR. That is the necessary result of the reasoning of the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No. The seeds to be gathered are those raised this year. Wheat is being harvested now. The Senator from Tennessee is reasoning from conditions in Mississippi, Arkansas, and Tennessee. Cotton is gathered in the fall, but wheat is being harvested now. The geography of the Senator's logic is altogether bad.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, if that is the case, I see no reason in the world why the Government should go into the wheat-seed business. There is no demand for it; the farmers are not asking for it. Why we should undertake at this early stage of the game, nearly a year before the crops are planted, to enter upon the storing of seed is more than I can understand.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is the Senator making that statement advisedly?

Mr. MCKELLAR. It seems to me that it is wholly unnecessary to store the seed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] yesterday, in discussing this matter, said that his State had made an appropriation, I think, of more than a half million dollars to be used for this purpose. The idea or purpose is that the seed shall be collected by the Government of the United States and turned over to the farmers in the Western States, or wherever the assistance may be needed, for cash. It is not a donation, but, on the contrary, it will be a profitable investment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That is the very point that I am making. Whatever necessity there is for seed is being taken care of either by the planters themselves or by the local authorities, as should be the case. There has been no demand made upon Congress; there has been no petition sent here for seed; and we know, as representatives of the people, that whenever there is such a demand coming from one district or one State it is instantly communicated to the Representative from the district or to the Senators from the State. No Senator, I think, has received any such request from his State.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will yield in just one moment. Now, under these circumstances, when we are borrowing money, when the Government's agents and representatives are going over the country urging the people to lend the Government money with which to prosecute this war, when, in fact, we are begging the people to lend the Government money with which to prosecute this war, it seems to me that it is not good business to use the money that we thus beg the people for for a purpose of this kind when there is no demand for it.

I would be as quick, as I stated yesterday, to vote for any measure that will increase the production of the country as any other Senator, but when a bill like this comes in, for which there is no demand and for which there is no reason at all, it seems to me that it is idle for Congress to be appropriating this immense sum, amounting to $2,500,000 in this one instance, to store seed when there is no demand for such action, so far as I know. If there is any Senator who has such a demand from his State, I would be glad to hear from him, because I want to be perfectly fair about this matter. I now yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, as stated by my colleague [Mr. FALL] yesterday, there is quite a demand in our State for seed, and this is not only true of the present time, but it will continue until the latter part of June; and so far as seed wheat is concerned, there will be a demand for seed wheat in the fall in that State. Now, I do not know about conditions in other States, but I am prone to believe that conditions are similar in at least other Western States. What I should like to ask the Senator is, Does he believe that if there is no demand for these seed the Department of Agriculture would expend any of this money in the purchase of these seed, and try to do a vain and useless thing?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think when we appropriate this large sum of money for the purchase and storing of seed the department will undertake to carry out the desire of Congress, and they will buy and they will store and they will create a great organization of men to do the buying and the storing in order to carry out the will of Congress. We know that that is true. We know that when we authorize the expenditure of money, it is constantly used in just that way. While here and there we may sell a few of these seed at cost, if we keep them as long as it seems to be necessary to keep them under this bill I should not be surprised if we would probably have to sell them at very much less than cost in order to dispose of them at all, because they will not be good seed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the senior Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Of course I understand that in Tennessee the beet-sugar industry does not occupy any great portion of the time or attention of the planters in that State. I do not know about the rice industry in that State. I presume that rice culture likewise does not occupy a great deal of attention in that State.

Mr. McKELLAR. Neither of them does; but that is neither here nor there. I am perfectly willing to be broad enough to cover those things, however, where they are needed in other States.

Mr. FALL. I will desist and ask the recognition of the Chair to make a statement later. I was leading up to a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to answer any question that I can on the part of the Senator. I did not mean to interrupt him.

Mr. FALL. I was simply leading up to a question, and possibly it is best that I should make a statement rather than to ask a question of the Senator. I wanted to call his attention to the fact that it is always necessary to import seed for certain crops. We do not produce beet seed for sugar purposes in this country. In the State of Arkansas, for instance, they do not sow the rice which they produce in that State. We go abroad for rice seed. We go abroad for sugar-beet seed. We go abroad for Bermuda onion seed. We buy them from the Bermuda Islands and other countries. In every agricultural appropriation bill appropriations are made for these purposes. The Department of Agriculture are constantly purchasing seeds, as I remarked yesterday, from Afghanistan, from Siberia, from every portion of the globe, and experimenting with them here. They have developed a large industry in that way. They developed the alfalfa industry, for example, in just exactly this way, by purchasing seeds and storing them and getting them out through the Congressmen to the farmers throughout the country, and assisting the farmers in purchasing them. The Government is a great purchasing agent. In the bill accompanying this bill in the House, what is known as the Lever bill, there is a provision that the Government shall buy and sell practically all farm products. It will place the United States in a position where it can buy, much more cheaply than any individual can buy, any necessary seed.

As my colleague [Mr. JONES of New Mexico] has just stated with reference to seed wheat, there would be a great demand for seed wheat provided you were allowed to use the lands in New Mexico for wheat culture this fall. There is now a great demand for beans, as I explained yesterday, in New Mexico. There is now a demand for feterita, milo maize, and kafir-corn seed in New Mexico; and I speak not only of New Mexico but of the other portions of the Southwest. There is a demand, and the fact that the Senator from Tennessee happens not to have heard of it does not in any respect lessen the demand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I judge, from the expressions of the two Senators from New Mexico, that there must be a demand in that State. I have asked the other Senators here if there was any demand from their several States——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. And I am willing to be still further enlightened. I should like to know in just what States there are demands for these seeds. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he has inquired of the Department of Agriculture if there is any demand?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I have not.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator think he might get more enlightenment by inquiring of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, I do not know, because I think the first complaints in all those matters come from the particular representatives from the various States.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that I have been informed this morning by the Department of Agriculture that there have been many such demands.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think almost anyone would take them if they were sent them, or some of them would even take them at cost if they could get them, because a great many people like to buy when they can buy at a bargain, whether they need the article or not. I know that that is true, and it is not only true of the ladies but among men; we frequently do the very same thing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desired to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is a member of the committee, whether or not the Secretary of Agriculture, who appeared before the committee, pointed out any particular places where seeds were needed?

Mr. KENYON rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I was simply going to say to the Senator that I have been trying to submit some remarks on this bill for a day or two, but have not been able to get an opportunity. When I get an opportunity I am going to say a few words.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Could not the Senator give me that specific information, as to what particular place the Secretary of Agriculture pointed out where they needed seeds and where he could get them and supply them under this bill?

Mr. KENYON. I can; but I would rather do it more logically later.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator to answer the question; but I want to say, with reference to such matters as have been touched upon by my esteemed friend from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], that we are taking care of those things now. The Department of Agriculture buys those seed. We have already appropriated for that purpose for another year. This is not a new project at all. Congress has appropriated what has been recommended for the purchase of all these new and unusual seed and a great many others that are not new or unusual. The Government is doing its full part about that, and I think it is entirely right. I vote for these appropriations for seed every year, and have done so ever since I have been in Congress, and I expect to continue to vote for them; but my point is this: Simply because we have declared war, that does not of itself make such an unusual condition that we ought to spend this vast sum for seed that no one has told us is necessary or even desirable except the two Senators from New Mexico. Now, I am willing to limit it so as to furnish New Mexico with seed if they need seed. To show that my heart is in the right place, if they need seed out in New Mexico, I am perfectly willing——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing that the appropriation should be reduced to such an amount as will furnish with seed those who want them; but I do not think there is any reason why we should spend this enormous sum for seed that no one else seems to believe or understand are necessary up to this time.

I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to remove from the mind of the Senator from Tennessee, or any other Senator here, the idea that New Mexico is always pleading for something especially for New Mexico. I presume we have about as little sectional feeling or idea in New Mexico as exists in any State in the Union. There was an assault made upon this item yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee and one or two other Senators, and statements were made, just as they are being made this morning, that there was no demand for this.

The Senator from New Mexico who is now speaking happens to have been in rather close touch with some of the agents who are engaged in attempting to develop the food products of the United States—possibly in closer touch than others for the reason that the Senator from New Mexico is a farmer himself and engaged in a variety of farming industries. The Senator from New Mexico happens to know something about the beet-sugar industry of the West, for instance. He knows, and presumes the Senator from Tennessee also knows, that beet-sugar seed is not produced in the United States. Heretofore it has been purchased from Germany. The market is now cut off, of course. The Agricultural Department of this Government has been for several months engaged in doing exactly what it was constituted for the purpose of doing—attempting to secure a supply of good beet-sugar seed for planting in Colorado and Utah and the rest of the country. It is necessary, as the Senator knows, for the department to obtain it when it can obtain it in this war when our great source of supply is shut off.

To a certain extent this is true about rice. You can not cultivate rice, for instance, in the State of Arkansas with the seed grown in the State of Arkansas. It is necessary for them to be purchased abroad and brought in. Every three years, at least, it is necessary to reproduce the seed entirely. The Senator probably does not know that this is also true of wheat in our western country; that you can not plant the same character of wheat in the great plateau region of the West or Southwest for three years in succession. If you do, your hard flint wheat deteriorates to a soft wheat, which does not make the flour of commerce. Therefore you must go somewhere else, to some other section of the country, and bring your winter Turkey red or other seed wheat into places of that kind. You must shift around.

The Department of Agriculture has facilities for doing this through its millions of dollars of appropriations given out every year, through its agents in every State in the Union, through the agricultural colleges with which it cooperates in every State in the Union, through its county agents in every county in every State in the Union, under the extension work which is now being performed; and an item in this bill provides for further extension work—the next item to the very matter which is now under discussion. The Agricultural Department is able to do a great service for the people of the country. It is engaged in doing that.

I am one of those who have found various matters for criticism in the conduct of the Agricultural Department. On the whole, in my judgment, it is doing more good for the people of the United States than any other department of this Government. The Agricultural Department of the National Government of the United States has done more to attempt to eradicate the boll-weevil evil than all the States in the South combined have done; and not one word has ever been uttered by any southern man against any kind of an appropriation, any hundreds of millions of appropriations, for flood control or for assistance to the cotton crop of the South.

I mention this merely because the Senators from the South understand the needs of the South. The needs of the West, the needs of the Northwest, the needs of the Pacific coast, and possibly the needs of the Atlantic coast are entirely distinct from those of the South. We must legislate for the entire country. The objection of the Senator that this item of two and a half millions will not be of any benefit to Tennessee or the South at this particular time may be perfectly well taken. All that the Senator from New Mexico has been attempting to do is to impress upon the mind of the Senator from Tennessee that there are other sections of the country with divergent needs, different needs, and that we are willing—and we pay the taxes exactly as the people of Tennessee do—to trust the Agricultural Department with this little item of $2,500,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that since I have already stated that I shall be glad to vote for any sum that may be needed or even desirable for the one State whose representatives have appeared on this floor and stated that their State had requested or wanted or needed seeds as provided in this item, I do not think the suggestion that I am dealing in sectionalism is well taken.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to go as far as any Senator on this floor for any part of our country; I do not care where it is. If we can increase the food supply of this country by these appropriations, I will go as far as any Senator on this floor to vote for it, in as large an amount as anyone, where it is necessary. But here is what I say: The Department of Agriculture came in here two or three months ago and provided for the very things of which the Senator speaks, the purchase of these seed in the manner stated, and the Congress has already appropriated such sums as were asked for by the department for these various purposes. Now, two months afterwards, and two months before the law permits them to use any of this money, some one in the department comes in and asks for $2,500,000 more. There seems to be a good deal of difference of view down there in the department as to whether it is needed or not. The Secretary seems to have one opinion about it, and some of his bureau chiefs seem to have another opinion about it, according to the reports here. I do not think I can be charged with anything except a desire to protect the Government in wanting to know what is the reason for these unusual appropriations.

They say it is because of the war. Very well; the department has looked out for that; it has come here and gotten an appropriation for the seeds, and now, after planting time for the great body of our country—whether it is after planting time in New Mexico or not I can not say, because I am not familiar with it, but at all events after planting time for the great body of the country—they come in and ask for $2,500,000 to store seeds, not to plant them but to store seeds, and sell such of them as may be wanted for cash.

I do not believe that the Government ought to go into the general seed business. I do not believe that it ought to interfere any more than is necessary. I do not believe that it ought to become the great seed emporium of the United States by selling seed in competition with its citizens. I think it is perfectly proper for the Government to go into the seed business to the extent of furnishing, through the Department of Agriculture and through Congress, unusual seed, unusual varieties, for the various parts of our country, so that the farmers of our country can get the very best kind of seed, to be tried in their climates and upon their particular soils. That is all right; but I do not think that simply because we have declared war the United States ought to go into the seed business generally. Surely if it were advisable to do it, if it were the best thing to be done, if it were the wisest thing for it to do to go into the seed business, we ought to go into it at a time when the seed were necessary, when we could do some good by it.

Some time ago I introduced a resolution doubling the amount of seed that the Department of Agriculture would send out for this past year, but the resolution came, as it seemed to me, too late, and I did not press it. That is my view of it. I think if it could have been gotten in time it would have been very wise to have duplicated the amount of seeds to be sent out this year to the whole country, but it is too late now. It is not necessary now; and I do not believe we ought to at such a time as this devote such a large sum of money for a purpose that is not needed according to the report of Senators on the floor, so far as they know, if they will except one State in the Union. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] tells me it is time for me to stop, and I will.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have listened rather intently for two days to pretty nearly the same speech. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] says he has secured no information as to the necessity of this item. If he had taken the trouble to inquire of the Department of Agriculture, he could have secured enlightenment in much less than the time he has taken to tell the Senate that he did not know anything about it, which I think was an entirely unnecessary statement to make.

Mr. President, I do not know whether Congress is going to awaken to the importance of this food question or not. I believe the country is awakened to its importance. I am not going to talk any hysteria about it at all. There is no need of hysteria, but there is need of common sense as applied to the situation, and a little less oratory and rhetoric.

I am not going to take the time now to discuss the whole food situation, though I realize that the attacks to a considerable extent that are being made on this small bill are directed toward the larger bill that will be before the Senate in a short while.

Mr. President, this general food question can not be exaggerated in its importance. We have enough food in this country to supply our people. We can grow enough to supply the world. But we are presented with a new problem by reason of the war. The whole final conclusion of this war is going to depend upon this food proposition. What is Germany indulging in her submarine-campaign for? To starve England. What is England trying to do with Germany? To starve Germany. Get rid of the food that is going to our allies by sinking it in the depths of the sea and the allies are then defeated, and everybody knows it. Bread is more important than bullets.

We might as well wake up to the importance of this food question. It is important to the Army and the Navy, of course, but it is important in another way, Mr. President, and that is it enters into the tranquillity of the United States. It enters into the final success of this war. Hungry people can not be very patriotic, and ill-fed soldiers can not defeat well-fed soldiers.

So there is a great broad question, more than the little appropriation for ticks and hog cholera and cattle abortion and all these things. Whatever the Department of Agriculture can do, and it is a great department, to conserve food in this country they are helping to domestic tranquillity and they are helping to the success of this war.

The Agricultural Committee has added to the House bill which will be reported here shortly a section against speculation, the bill which the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has introduced. That is also in the interest of domestic tranquillity. We can theorize here about the cost and prices of wheat and give reasons for them that are perfectly logical, and that the increased supply of gold has caused prices in everything to increase, but you can not sit down and reason to people in this country on small salaries and small wages any fine-spun theories. They believe that speculation has had something to do with this situation, and nearly everybody else believes that speculation has had something to do with it.

Now, we are going to make certain kinds of speculation a crime, with a penitentiary sentence to it and with no fine. We are going to fix it, if the Senate will pass the amendment to this bill which I refer to, so that those pirates in this country who are robbing the people by cornering foodstuffs which the people must have will go to the penitentiary and will not get away on any fine. That will tend to domestic tranquillity upon the part of those who have to eat and are not living by speculating in foodstuffs.

I might just say that the increase of wages in this country, while it has been perhaps large, has not kept pace with the increase in the cost of living, and the most illuminating testimony that I have heard was the testimony of Prof. King on that subject before our committee, in which he showed the matter very clearly.

How are the laboring people to live under present conditions?

The farmers are not getting all this increase. There is too much of a variation between what the farmer gets and what the consumer has to pay. We must not do anything here on this food question that will irritate the farmers of the country or will take away from them their enthusiasm which they now have as patriotic citizens to produce; but the farmer wants his share, his honest share, of what the consumer has to pay. He wants the laws of supply and demand to be in free operation. A minimum guarantee, as has been suggested, will stimulate production. It is too late for it now to do any good this year. We have idled along on this proposition for a month. When Mr. Perkins was before the Agricultural Committee just a month ago yesterday he said that unless something was done on that subject right away it would be of no use; that a month was a year on this question. That was just a month ago yesterday. The chairman of the committee agreed to that proposition. So we have lost about a month.

I am not criticizing anybody. I know how difficult it is to get things done in Congress. We have been three days on this little bill now, when we passed a $3,000,000,000 appropriation bill in two days. We have had the same thing argued over and over again on this bill, all on the theory of economy.

Mr. President, I expect I have been as strongly for economy as any man in this Chamber, and I am now. I do not think we ought to go wild on these appropriations just because it is war time. We ought to look carefully into every one of them. But it is exceedingly interesting to me to see gentlemen talking about economy in furnishing a few seed to the farmers for cash when these gentlemen have consistently opposed any proposition in this Chamber looking to the stopping of sending out seeds in the free congressional distribution, which are nothing but political seeds and cost this Nation nearly $300,000 a year. These little excursions into economy are splendid. Spasmodically hysterical.

The Senator from Tennessee objects to this appropriation for seeds. In the Sixty-fourth Congress we passed a joint resolution appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee, and Mississippi, and that act provided that—

> The Secretary of War, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is authorized to expend so much of the aforesaid sum as he may deem necessary in supplying such seeds as may be suitable to produce quick growing crops.

That was partially for Tennessee. All the Senate voted for that, I think, because they realized that the question of seeds is at the bottom of a good food supply in this country, and the question of seeds now and next year is important on the food question in this country. I do not believe there was a dissenting vote to that appropriation of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

The Secretary of Agriculture came before the Committee on Agriculture this session and stated that he had inquiries about this seed question, and he said these significant words, which I want to put in the RECORD:

> Especially should we undertake to protect and safeguard the seed supply for next year.

True, indeed.

We can not do much this year, of course; the season has gone by.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has the Senator the letter fully discussing the importance of this seed question that we had before the committee on the previous occasion and also this morning?

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator refer to the statement I read this morning?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I will state to the Senator that was not a letter. It was a dictation I made from what came to me over the telephone from the Agricultural Department. I was going to refer to it.

The Senator from Tennessee tells us there is no necessity for this appropriation. I have discussed it so far as a general proposition as to how it inheres in the whole food situation. Now, I want to get down to brass tacks as to the present situation, and I give my information as coming to me from the Department of Agriculture.

I wish to say this, Mr. President. It seems every time the Agricultural bill gets here it is a sort of a football, mostly a rhetorical kind of a football, for everybody to get after. It has been so now. You have got to depend on somebody in this Government being square and honest and patriotic besides Congress in this emergency. We are all honest and patriotic, and admit it, and know nearly everything, and admit it; but here are men in the Department of Agriculture, specialists along their line, splendid types, doing honest work and doing earnest work, and yet we peck away at anything that they seem to ask. I do not know why it is.

The purpose of this item is to meet emergencies that may arise. It is not provided in this item, and it is not proposed by the department to provide for the indiscriminate distribution of food, nor to relieve farmers of their own responsibility in saving their own seed supply. Emergencies are continually coming up in the Department of Agriculture and appeals are made to them because of these emergencies in different parts of the country. Right here now in the last two days there has been a cyclone reaching over the Middle West country. Those may be some of the people who will have to be aided by the Department of Agriculture. Right now the Department of Agriculture is trying to assist farmers in Alabama in getting their seed corn. You can not take the corn from Iowa and other States and plant it in Alabama. You have got to experiment with just the kind of corn that will be adapted to that climate. That is one of the things at this moment that is being asked of the Department of Agriculture and one of the things for which this appropriation could be used.

I referred to the fact that last year there was a widespread destruction of staple seed crop from North Carolina to Mississippi. We passed that emergency act for that purpose, and all that money was used for the benefit of those agricultural classes except $60,000, which was returned to the Treasury of the United States.

In this item here for seed the money is not lost. The seeds are being purchased by the Government and sold to the farmers for cash. The money all comes back. The Government does not lose a cent; but by reason of the fact that the Government is buying in large quantities and can buy cheaper it may help the poor farmers in certain sections of the country to get the seed cheaper, and it may not. If it does not, the money will all be here and will not be expended.

I see that my friend from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is not here who was so interested in the seed question on yesterday. If the Government last year had had a million and a half bushels of good spring seed wheat, the farmers of South Dakota would not be forced to use the shrunken seed, as they have this year, the productivity of which is not at all certain. The condition of that seed is due to the black rust which they had.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] came before our committee. I have not secured a copy of just the bill which he introduced, but I think it was a bill proposing to appropriate $500,000 for the Government to loan to the farmers for seeds.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. KENYON. Am I mistaken about that?

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that I did not introduce any bill. I had contemplated introducing it and had drafted one, but before introducing it I got information that the situation in Montana was being very nicely taken care of by the people of our State.

Mr. KENYON. That is the business men and the bankers of Montana took care of the situation?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. It was a seed situation, was it not—a dearth of seeds? There may be other States that could not have taken care of the situation as well as Montana.

Mr. WALSH. The chief variety of wheat grown in our State is winter wheat and in many sections of the State the crop had been winterkilled. It was represented that where the winter wheat had been killed the ground should be seeded with spring wheat, and that many of the farmers had exhausted their resources in seeding last fall and would be unable to secure the seed wheat, and the aid of the Federal Government was asked. But before the bill was introduced I had information, as stated, that the situation was being taken care of locally and satisfactorily.

Mr. KENYON. But the Senator felt when the emergency was first presented to him that it was of such a nature that the Government should furnish some aid.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. The condition of wheat in Montana was alleviated by the local people. Does that furnish any argument why the Government should not relieve other sections if they require relief?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all, and that is exactly the point I am making in connection with this feature of the bill as it now stands. It would be utterly useless for the people of my State for the Government to buy seed and sell it for cash. The conditions as represented were that they were unable to provide the cash, and I can very readily conceive that the same conditions might exist elsewhere. Therefore, as the bill originally came from the Department of Agriculture, there is an appropriation of money for the purchase of seeds to be sold to the farmers upon credit. I can see some basis for it; I can see some reason for it; but I have yet to hear of any condition that would seem to require that the Government should buy seed and sell it to the farmers for cash.

Mr KENYON. Mr. President, the answer to that, I think, is perfectly apparent. There is certain seed that the individual farmer is unable to secure, such as the situation arising as to the corn of which I spoke, in the North and in the South.

There is a further argument in favor of the proposition, and that is that the Government in times of stress to the farmer can buy in larger quantities and can let the farmer have the seed cheaper than he would if he bought it himself. There is the third point, that the farmer can not ship out seed from, we will say, Minneapolis to North Dakota in the small amounts that the individual farmer would require as cheaply as if the Government shipped it out in larger quantities. Then the individual farmer would have the opportunity to buy it.

While I, of course, realize that it would be much better for the farmer, solely from his standpoint, if he could buy the seed on credit—and that is the House provision—the Senate committee felt that the experience of the Government in the past would not warrant such provision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I simply want to add that I should not be at all averse to making some provision if any considerable section of the country should suffer by some disaster of nature, by some fortuitous circumstance, which deprives its inhabitants temporarily of the ability of taking care of themselves. We made an appropriation, I think, to take care of sufferers from the flood in Ohio; we made an appropriation to take care of the sufferers from the floods in some of the Southern States. It is not at all improbable, as the Senator from Iowa now suggests, that it may be necessary to afford some relief to people who have suffered within the last few days from tornadoes. The circumstance to which I adverted in connection with my own State was in its nature fortuitous. It was an extraordinary thing that the fields in a great area of country in that way should be winterkilled. I thought the case fell within the class which the National Government frequently relieves—a community suffering from some disaster of nature. If any Senator should rise upon the floor and say, "The people of my section of the country by reason of some disaster of some kind or other find it necessary to appeal to the Government to furnish them with seed," I should be much disposed to help them out.

Mr. KENYON. Well, what is the objection to this proposition?

Mr. WALSH. But I have heard no one avow the existence of conditions in any section of the country which would justify us in making an appropriation either as a gift or as a loan. While I can understand that there may be seeds of a rare character or of a peculiar nature that may be procurable from the Government when they would not be procurable in the open market, nobody has told us of that condition of affairs. Thus, I must say frankly to the Senator from Iowa that I have found no justification, at least sufficient for myself, for this appropriation for the purchase of seeds to be sold for cash to the farmers.

Mr. KENYON. Well, of course, that is the line of differentiation. I should think the Senator would not object to a fund to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture to be used if the emergency should arise. If the emergency does not arise the money will never be used. If the emergency does arise the Secretary of Agriculture can take care of it.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. Referring to the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I desire to say that it seems to me that a great many Senators do not view this section of the bill as the members of the committee viewed it. We were not thinking at that time of an immediate emergency, but we were thinking of what would happen in another year. The matter was fully discussed in the committee, and the fact was mentioned that it was not so much a question of buying seed for the farmers as it was a question of the ability of the Government to secure the seeds and to distribute them to better advantage than any private individual could possibly do. That was one of the main reasons why the committee adopted this particular section.

It seems to me in this emergency, when we are all trying to encourage the farmer just as much as possible, when we only a short while ago appropriated a hundred million dollars, after only eight minutes' discussion, that we ought to be willing to trust our Secretary of Agriculture to use this small appropriation judiciously and properly.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to close what I have to say.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Iowa in that direction for just a minute I desire to bring out particularly what he has suggested and as bearing on the need of some provision like this.

The fact is, as the Senator has stated, that the farmers can not always supply themselves with the seeds which they need. There are certain products which depreciate in quality and in kind and which get to be almost worthless where they are propagated by the same seed raised from the same crops on the same farm each year. Take, for instance, as an illustration, sea-island cotton, which is a long-staple cotton. If the seed of the crop this year is used for next year and the seed of that crop is used for the following year it will gradually lapse back into a short-staple cotton and lose its distinctive character entirely as sea-island long-staple cotton. It is necessary, therefore, for the growers of that crop to get the seed each year from some other portion of the country, from some other source, in order that they may keep the character of that product up to the standard.

I have no doubt the same principle obtains as to corn possibly, and also as to wheat, oats, and some other products. You may say that the farmer ought to provide at least his own seed; but he can not always do that. For that very reason he must get the seed from somewhere else. I know in the case of sea-island cotton, I have had frequent applications from growers of that article in Florida for new seed, fresh seed, from different sources. I have referred the matter to the Department of Agriculture, and sometimes the department has been able to furnish the seed.

I mention this because, it seems to me, it has a bearing on the argument of the Senator from Iowa as calling for a fund like this, a provision whereby the Department of Agriculture can keep on hand seed that can be used in different parts of the country for the purpose of keeping up the standard of the crops.

Then, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has suggested, in answer to the argument of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], that the season is probably over and that we do not need the seed, there is another year coming, there is another crop coming, and there is another need and a new need coming just ahead of us.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator from Florida for his suggestion.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. PAGE. I confess, Mr. President, that in the consideration of this question it has seemed to me that the great, the overpowering, reason why we should appropriate this fund is that the Federal Government may in this time of war become a clearing house for the whole country in the distribution of seeds. Has any argument been offered in objection to that theory?

Mr. KENYON. That theory, I will say to the Senator from Vermont, has not, I think, as yet been advanced. It would be interesting for the Senator to elucidate that, and I will give up the floor in just a moment or two that he may do so.

Mr. PAGE. I do not desire the Senator to do that, but I merely asked the question. To my mind that is important. I remember that in the discussion before our committee that question was raised.

Mr. KENYON. It was; but it had escaped my mind for the moment. It is a very important consideration.

Mr. PAGE. It appealed to me as being the strong reason for this appropriation.

We know that we can not always, by sending to seed markets like Chicago and Minneapolis, get good seed; we can not always get seed which is best adapted for all localities. If this matter were taken in hand by the Department of Agriculture, and they, through their agents, found what seed was in the market for distribution, ascertained as to its availability or desirability for any particular section of the country, as a clearing house the Government would become really very important.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad the Senator has made that statement. I think I hinted at it, but did not go into it very far.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I am anxious to conclude, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. Relative to the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I desire to say that I received the same impression as that gained by the Senator from Vermont; and I think it has been fortified by the very able argument of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. The point that he desires to make, and that we wish to impress upon the Senate, is the fact that we want to be prepared for an emergency. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] appeared before our committee and favored a bill appropriating $5,000,000, I believe, to purchase seeds for farmers in parts of the country where the crops had been frozen out by the severe winter. What we want—and the matter, I think, has been presented in a very able way by the Senator from Iowa—is to have this $2,500,000 available for use by the Secretary of Agriculture, so that in case next winter the crop should freeze in Montana or in Idaho, or something detrimental should happen to it in New Mexico, the Secretary of Agriculture will have this fund available without having to wait on Congress for an appropriation. It will enable him probably to purchase the seeds, and all he will have to do will be to distribute them.

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark that I do not think that it would do us any good if we had to pay cash for the seed. We could go out on the market and buy it.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Montana and some of the rest of us can not agree on that proposition. I am glad to have my remarks interpreted by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. Possibly they may be more clearly understood.

It ought to be understood that this item is not intended merely for the indiscriminate distribution of seed. It is more in the nature of an insurance against conditions that may arise when the crops of this country may be seriously affected. In Great Britain they have formulated some plan in their department of agriculture and fisheries to finance schemes for the distribution of seed potatoes, realizing that that is a most important matter.

Mr. President, I did not rise to make an extended speech on the food question. I had intended at sometime to discuss the general food question; but I am going to wait until the larger bill gets over here; and I think there will be plenty of time then to discuss it. I should, however, like to plead for some speed, if possible, within the bounds of reason upon this bill. This survey could be made by the Secretary of Agriculture within 30 days. We ought to know just what the food supply of this Nation is. That is of prime importance to the Nation now. That item and the seed item are practically the only things in this bill outside of the appropriations. This $2,500,000 appropriation is merely to provide a fund, which will never be spent except in an emergency, and then, if it is spent, it will be returned to the Government. What better work can we do than that along the line of food conservation?

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from Harrison, Idaho, which is very pleasing to me, and I am going to ask the privilege of presenting it to the Senate and reading it into the RECORD. It is as follows:

HARRISON, IDAHO, May 28, 1917.

Senator JAMES H. BRADY,
Washington, D. C.:

Harrison, with 1,000 population, has sent 40 men to the front, and we are growing all foodstuff possible. At a mass meeting last night we unanimously voted to petition you to use all your influence and authority to abolish liquor during the war.

D. SHANAHAN,
JOHN PUGH WAYNE,
Committee.

In this connection, Mr. President, I am going to read a short article from Collier's of May 7, 1917. It is headed "A challenge from Idaho," and reads as follows:

Collier's printed an editorial headed "Getting your town ready." R. B. Corcoran, of Chloride, Ariz., comes back with a letter which includes this:

"I should like to call your attention to the town of Harrison, Idaho. By the census of 1910 Harrison had a population of 980. Since the severance of diplomatic relations with Germany she has sent 10 boys to the Navy and, to quote the local paper, The Searchlight, 'several more will follow when school is out.' What other town of equal size can show so good a record?"

It is a record to be proud of. There is inspiration in the thought that the boys of far-inland towns in Idaho, in Montana, in Kansas, will, under the flag of Perry, Decatur, Farragut, and Dewey, help to carry on the world's work in sweeping from the ocean and from history the pirates of the twentieth century, as a century ago their ancestors freed the Mediterranean Sea of the Barbary corsairs. They have enlisted in the Navy in a glorious hour, these boys of Harrison.

I feel very proud of this article from Collier's. I wish to say in passing that it may be of interest to note that Idaho was the first State officially to purchase liberty bonds, $100,000 worth being taken on the very day the subscriptions were opened.

I also wish to call attention to the fact that so many young men from the State University of Idaho at Moscow, Idaho, left the institution to enter the western training camp for officers or to enlist in the Regular forces of the Army and Navy or to return to the farm to assist in the production of crops that it almost necessitated the closing down of the college for the year. It may be well to recall that it is a matter of official record that the University of Idaho sent more men as volunteers to the Army in the war with Spain in proportion to its enrollment than any other university or college of a like character in the United States. Many of its students gave their lives to their country in that war, and on the university campus now stands monuments to their memory. Inspired by the example of the student body in 1898, the indications are that the university will furnish even a greater proportionate number of volunteers in the war against Germany.

Referring again to Harrison, Idaho, I wish to say that Harrison has furnished 2½ per cent of its population already for the Army and Navy. If the entire country should give this same proportion, 2,500,000 men would be available, which would fill the requirements of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard to more than overflowing.

Mr. President, I am proud to receive the telegram I have read from the splendid little city of Harrison, Idaho; and I am glad to be able to say on the floor of the Senate that I shall use every endeavor to assist them in the good work they are doing in the effort to abolish the liquor traffic during the war.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I regard the provision of the bill now being discussed, which provides for the gathering together, storing, and distributing of seeds where needed to our farmers at cost, as one of the most meritorious features of the entire bill. More or less has been said in regard to its being an emergency measure, or being adopted under the pretext of emergency. I believe that it is a desirable measure even in times of peace—a measure providing for seed, and an additional avenue whereby the farmers of this country, if it becomes necessary, may be able to equip themselves for carrying on their farming operations.

One of the great cries throughout the Nation to-day is for the increase of farm production. If we are to increase and enlarge the yield of our farms, necessarily there will be a greater amount of seed required throughout the country. I am firmly convinced that the provision is a very wise one, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] should not prevail. The measure does not carry with it the idea of a gift to the farmer, but merely that of providing an additional method or avenue through which he may, in case of necessity, acquire his seed. I hope that the amendment will not prevail, and that the appropriation for assisting the farmers of our country in providing seed will be allowed to stand.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I very much hope that the Senate will accept the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture on this seed proposition. I wish myself to thank the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] for stating the purpose of this provision so clearly, so that we may see what the issue is. As I now understand it, it is merely whether the Senate is willing to trust a fund of a substantial amount in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture so that he may, if the need arises, have in his hands funds by which he can buy seeds and furnish them for cash to the farmers.

I do not know that the emergency is upon us. I do not know that it may be met this season. I do not know that it will arise next year; but, speaking as a Democrat, I am glad to say that I have sufficient confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture to allow him to have this fund. I feel humiliated that the chief defense of the Secretary of Agriculture on this floor should come from the other side of the Chamber, and I wish to add my thanks to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] for coming to the rescue of the Democratic administration in this emergency.

There seems to be a field to-day for great objectors to advertise themselves at the expense of the American people. Our Government has undertaken the biggest job it ever has undertaken or probably ever will undertake, and that is to help this war through to a successful conclusion; and it is a very poor way, indeed, to help the Government to stand up here and attack the administration or different members of the administration.

I thank the Republican Members once more for their help; and I hope some of the Democrats will follow the example of one of our new Members, the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who has just spoken, and back up the administration instead of opposing it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words about this entire bill. It is constructed upon the theory that a great responsibility falls upon this country, in connection with the war, to furnish foodstuffs to England, France, and Italy, as well as to retain a supply for ourselves. Each item in the bill is intended to promote that single object—first, a study of the food supply and the acquirement of information by the Secretary of Agriculture; second, certain increased funds to stimulate production and to give cooperation to the farmer along lines of demonstration, that the soil may be, if possible, made to produce even more than usual this year and, perchance, next year.

This seed provision has been inserted at the direct request of the department. It is due to the conviction of the department that it is needed. The department, studying the whole field, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, from the Lakes to the Gulf, this year and next year, will be in a position to see where food production can be increased and stimulated by putting in the hands of the farmers at some places better seeds than they have, and by assuring the fact that at each point the necessary seeds can be obtained. It is a stimulation of production. We have limited it by the provision that the seeds are to be disposed of through the department for cash. It is merely placing in the hands of the Department of Agriculture temporarily a fund of $2,500,000 to provide a supply of seeds and provide means of transportation. The seeds, when disposed of, are to be paid for in cash. It is a utilization of an existing agency, with no cost to the Government.

With the exception of one provision, I have referred to the entire scope of the bill. That other provision was not reported from the committee but has been offered from the floor by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I consider it of great importance. It is the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, reported also by the Judiciary Committee, I believe, this morning, which undertakes, after the product leaves the farm, between that time and the time when the product reaches the consumer, to put a stop to improper conduct by hoarding and by extortion. It is to stop the improper manipulation of food products between the time it leaves the farmer and reaches the consumer. It is the careful work largely of the Senator from Montana, who was upon the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee which considered the bill, and I think with that added to this bill, as a whole, it will be a measure of great value.

We will see that the farmer gets these seeds. We will see that the farmer has the cooperation of the trade experts to stimulate production. We will study the problem of distribution, and all along the line we will increase and intensify the action of the Department of Agriculture, because we feel that an unusual responsibility rests upon our country now in the matter of food supplies. I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will go far toward checking any food manipulation or food speculation that will change the price unduly from the time the farmer sells it to the time the consumer acquires it.

I am for the bill as a whole with the Walsh amendment, believing that that amendment is a most important part of the measure. We had one of similar character before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but I and others urged that we wait for the work of the Judiciary Committee, which the Agricultural Committee was advised had a subcommittee working on the subject. We omitted including any provision on the subject in the bill before the Committee on Agriculture only because the majority of us preferred to wait for the action of the Judiciary Committee and cooperate to ingraft the provision that the Judiciary Committee submitted as a part of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article appearing in the New York Sun of recent date entitled:

Seek to admit Chinese labor. Movement to let in coolies starts on Pacific coast. Needed for duration of war.

In the course of the article the following occurs:

Senator WALSH, of Montana, who is said to favor the idea as a means of making up the scarcity in labor on the big ranches of the Northwest, is understood to have gone so far as to prepare a bill covering the proposal for a limited importation of Chinese coolies.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that I do not favor the idea, that I never did favor the idea, that I have prepared no bill on the subject, that I never thought of preparing a bill on the subject, nor did I ever give any intimation to anyone that I thought of preparing a bill on the subject.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, aside from that the article is correct, is it? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Apparently the only foundation for the newspaper report is the following from a few remarks that I made on the floor of the Senate on May 2, namely:

Mr. President, I am satisfied the people of the country—at least if I may speak from conditions which prevail in my own State—are exerting every effort to get under cultivation the largest possible acreage of ground; but a great problem confronts us, and that is the problem of providing labor for the proper cultivation and harvesting of these great crops. A citizen of my State called upon me to-day and seriously proposed that we suspend the operation of our immigration laws, so as to permit the introduction into the country of 250,000 Chinese to work upon the farms and in related industries in this country.

I naturally assumed that the language I used would carry the impression that the suggestion found no favor in my mind.

Mr. President, I inquire whether the pending motion is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to strike out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Montana that that is correct.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire, then, whether the committee amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendments have not been disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That motion came in in connection with a committee amendment which reduced the amount in the bill; and as a substitute for the reduction of the amount by the committee the Senator from Tennessee moved to strike out the entire item.

Mr. WALSH. The committee amendment, as I understand, was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. So that in the regular order we will pass to the next committee amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator is right, and the motion is out of order.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator any objection to voting on it at this time, since it has been discussed?

Mr. WALSH. None whatever, except that if that amendment is adopted, then section 2, of course, should come out of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Because there would be no appropriation with which to carry out the provisions of section 2; and the test, it seems to me, should come upon a motion to strike out section 2 rather than this provision. I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether that would not be the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I think not, because the appropriation could be made at any time that the Congress might see fit hereafter for that purpose. I do not think it is appropriate that this appropriation should be made right now.

Mr. WALSH. I defer to the committee if they desire to have a vote now.

Mr. KENYON. What is the harm, now that the matter has been discussed as to the appropriation, of voting on it? If the appropriation goes out, the other goes out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana what was the date of the publication in the New York Evening Sun which he has read to the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. May 22.

Mr. PHELAN. I have been in receipt of numerous telegrams from labor organizations of California, some of which I have had printed in the RECORD, since May 22, and I suppose the rumor originated in the Eastern States that it was the intention of Congress to consider the relaxation of the restrictions of the Chinese-exclusion law. I have been unable to find any serious attempt on the part of anybody to relax those laws, and I am sure that the people of the West will be satisfied with the statement made by the Senator from Montana that it certainly was not he who originated the idea of meeting the emergency of the shortage of labor by letting down the bars. The Department of Labor has a well-considered plan in contemplation of enlisting—I would not say conscripting—the younger generation ineligible for war service on account of age, in the work of supplying the necessary labor in the fields and in the orchards.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Montana and that just made by the Senator from California, I think if the Senator from California would investigate the action of the Labor Department recently he might find that the action of the department in reference to the suspension of the literacy clause in the immigration bill and the contract-labor clause, under a certain provision contained in the immigration bill, might have given rise to the suggestion or to the thought that if the Secretary, under the particular clause to which I have referred, would have a right to suspend the literacy clause and to suspend the contract-labor clause, he would have an equal right—and I do not think there is any question of it—to suspend the Chinese-exclusion act. Possibly that may have given rise to some of the rumors that have been heard. As a matter of fact, the order has been made, and the literacy clause and the contract-labor clause are actually, at the present moment, suspended on the southern border of the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that the Secretary of Labor has—under what power, I do not know—suspended the literacy test and the contract-labor prohibition in the immigration law, for the very worthy purpose of supplying needed labor in the southern border. I have reference more particularly to the California-Mexican border, where the Mexicans have been accustomed, in normal times, without objection from any source, to come across the border and work in the vineyards and the orange groves. So the wise action of the Secretary in this great emergency has passed without challenge, as far as I am aware, by the men and women more particularly interested in the welfare of labor, through their organizations. I am glad to be able to inform the Senator from New Mexico, however, that the department has informed me that with respect to oriental labor it is opposed to relaxing the laws, and whatever they may have done in the case of our neighbors in Mexico they have no intention whatever of doing with respect to orientals.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, relative to the condition on the southern border, I fear that even that condition is fraught with danger, but I am in hopes that the matter may be controlled by the department in a manner so that there will be no particular injury. However, I do not want the impression to go abroad, so far as I am concerned, that the West is in favor in any way of suspending the immigration laws in order to relieve the present situation. I do not believe that that time has yet arrived. I know the West is not in favor of any such action. I fully agree with what the Senator from California has said along those lines.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4188. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2344) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. GORE. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is passing strange to me that nothing can get through the Senate in its own name any more. I call the attention of the sponsors of this bill who are members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the course of the argument here in behalf of an appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seed to farmers or truck gardeners in various parts of the United States. This amendment has been argued all day and most of yesterday. That is not the appropriation in this item. The item particularly under consideration now is an insect pay roll wearing the livery of a Government seed store. Fraud always lurks in generalities. That is a universal maxim that the chancellor applies in trying to arrive at justice where he is not hampered by strict statutes or rules merely artificial in character.

Of the $2,500,000 the front foot is for the purchase and distribution of seed and the body and the hinder part of its legislative anatomy is for the control and eradication of insects. But stop right there. It is so general in character that it will include anything in the entire entomological world. It might be the pursuit and collection of tent caterpillars in connection with the food supply, because they destroy large quantities of fruit. It could just as well be connected with the white butterflies that are pests in cabbage fields, or any of the pests and annoyances of the well-known crops of the cotton belt for which very liberal appropriation, and properly so, are already made. With those I had no objection at the time they were pending in the Senate. I do not remember now a single dissenting voice against those necessary appropriations. This is for the control and eradication of insects. I will not be hypercritical and say anything about the language of this paragraph, but there is no kind of legislation that will control insects. If there is, I should like to have some of the experts in the Department of Agriculture or on the Agricultural Committee communicate that information to the Senate before we adjourn or conclude the consideration of this bill. You may kill an insect but you can not regulate it. Still, if we were to take this paragraph it would be for the control and eradication of insects.

It goes on further, "and plant diseases," but it is evident that that purpose was contained in the paragraph referred to and in this portion of it. It is to control and eradicate insects and plant diseases. For the control of plant diseases it would be very well to take some steps.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to say to the Senator, so that he may be clear about this matter—and I do not wonder he does not understand it, because we neglected to explain it—the bill passed by the House yesterday separates the item for seed and the item for the control and eradication of insects and plant diseases, making the appropriation for insect and plant diseases $441,000. The Agricultural Committee this morning has stricken that out of the bill. Now, we are working in this situation here. The House bill has been recalled to correct an error. It will be back here in a short time; but the provision as to the eradication of insect and plant diseases should go out of this item that we are now discussing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it will be purely for the distribution of seeds?

Mr. KENYON. Purely the seed proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. How are you going to get the seeds? I will confine myself entirely to the proposition that eventually will be before the Senate for a vote. Where will the Government buy them? From somebody who now owns the desired kind of seeds. The Government does not own anything. The Government does not produce anything. The Government has no facilities for producing. It has neither workmen nor fields nor seed nor power nor soil, pay rolls, or anything else, to produce the desired article that it is to furnish here to the producer. The only way, therefore, that the Government can obtain the necessary seeds is to go out and buy them from those who already have them in private life. At what price will they be bought from the holder of these various kind of grain? At a price to be fixed by the Government. Who will fix it? The National Defense Council, the Secretary of Agriculture, the President through some delegated power that he may exercise, or how? It will have to be fixed in some way.

That brings up the same question that was referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] a day or two ago.

It was answered in this way, that the Government will fix a price for the surplus that the farmer has in his possession, and I assume that he would be compelled to sell it for that price. I refer particularly to this language when this same bill was being considered on the 26th day of May, last Saturday, in which the Senator said:

> For the prosecution of this war the Government ought to take over the production of all the essential necessities of life, such as coal, steel, lumber, and food. They should take from the farmer friend of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] the 5,000 bushels of grain which he has raised himself at a price to be fixed by the Government; and then the commodities should be distributed at cost.

Mr. BRADY. From what Senator is the Senator quoting?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quoting from the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] on Saturday in commenting on this bill.

The price to be fixed by the Government necessarily implies that some department or some Government official will decide that price. It will be the Secretary of Agriculture or he will delegate the power to some bureau or commission. In addition to that the President himself might be vested with the power or might undertake the purchase under the provisions of the bill by delegating it either to the Department of Agriculture or some other department. At any rate after a while it must get into the hands of some Government official. It can not be exercised practically in any other way. That is the material part of it with which I am concerned. Orders can be delivered to a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives or any employee of the Government, to a railroad man, to a member of any labor union, to a State officer or municipal officer. They all can be reached by some kind of influence. They can be in some way compelled to or argued with so that they will yield some of their views. They will go on in the discharge of their duties in whatever official or private capacity they may be acting.

There is one thing that you can not do. You can not say to a farmer that he must produce grain or sell it at a fixed price to the Government and produce at the same time a full crop of food products in this country. I should like to see the Government try that, as all-powerful as the Government is supposed to be, either in peace or war. There were about 13,000,000 working on farms and about 6,500,000 farmers in the United States, in 1910, say. That would include the cotton raiser, the sugar plantation man, all the cereals, dairy, live stock, and every form of market and truck gardening in the United States, either owners, tenants, or help. They are all engaged together with the live-stock men in the production of some kind of food.

I do not want Congress to make a mistake, and especially the Senate to ask the farmer to produce a large crop, and then say in addition to that he must sell it at a price to be fixed by the Department of Agriculture or some other Government bureau.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. I wish the Senator to give the Committee on Agriculture all that is its due, because that committee is certainly guilty of enough without being charged with shortcomings of which it is not guilty.

The bill as it came from the House, House bill 4188, provided that—

> The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds, except the producer thereof, to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable.

I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that that part of the bill was stricken out by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and, so far as I know, there is now no authority in the bill before us to take by requisition any of the seeds to which the Senator has been referring.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I understand; but how are you going to get it?

Mr. PAGE. By purchase. The Government may purchase, for instance, its potatoes in Maine or it may purchase them in Vermont. I understand that there is to-day a combination in the Aroostook region of Maine which has forced the price of potatoes so high the farmers feel that it would be unsafe to buy them to plant at this time. But there are potatoes in other sections, and the Secretary of Agriculture or his agent, through his clearing-house system, ascertains where potatoes are cheapest, where they are of the best quality, and he can furnish them under this bill to those farmers who do not know to-day where to purchase them at reasonable figures. But there is no power to requisition, as I understand it, in the bill that is now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I understand in like manner. I have made the inquiry how the Government will find the potatoes or whatever other products are needed.

Mr. PAGE. By the appropriation granted by the bill and the clearing-house machinery organized under the appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where will they buy them?

Mr. PAGE. Wherever they can buy the best seed at the lowest price.

Mr. SHERMAN. Anybody can do that. The Government has no particular facilities for that purchase over anybody else.

Mr. PAGE. No; but others who buy may speculate upon the farmer's necessities in times like these with little regard for the needs of the farmer. It is supposed that the Secretary of Agriculture will be careful of those needs, and be particular to see that the farmer gets the best possible seed at the lowest possible price.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the Government may just as well buy clothing. The farmer will need clothing this summer of a seasonable character and next winter. We may just as well control the wool supply. If the Government is going to undertake the paternal act on potatoes and seeds, then it had just as well burn its bridges behind it and go the limit on every human necessity. It can not be justified on that ground. I have never yet found the Government either as prompt, economical, or efficient as private enterprise.

This Government does not have anything but what it gets from the taxpayer to buy from the man who owns it. It must pay the market price or confiscate it in whole or in part. It is only by the exercise of the power of taxation that the Government has anything, and if it starts on seeds it might just as well finish up with shoes.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. FALL. Is not the real objection to this item that it would be putting the Government in competition with the present seed houses and salesmen of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it is not. The Senator misconceives entirely the drift of my argument.

Mr. FALL. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not that it puts the Government in competition with the houses which are handling these seeds, because the houses may have a very limited supply this time of year. The real source of supply is not in the hands of the commission men. There may be some isolated cases, as in New England territory, but the source of supply is not in the hands of commission men in the great grain and food purchasing areas of the country. New England is not self-sustaining in food products. We must depend on some other more agricultural part of the United States. I do not know whether the arid and semiarid regions of the West and Southwest are entirely food sustaining in their production or not. It is more difficult to gain accurate information than it is from the great areas where the food products are found in the hands of the original producers.

Mr. FALL. I think if the Senator wants information he can get it. Heretofore my State of New Mexico has not been self-supporting in the matter of food products. As a matter of fact, only about 40 per cent of the food products used in the State are produced there. It is now trying to produce more. It is not asking financial assistance or help, but simply such assistance as can legitimately be rendered, so that it may become actually self-supporting. Of course, the Senator understands that it is more than self-supporting, because it furnishes copper and iron and coal which are used by the other States of the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. Potatoes, wheat, corn, seed generally for seed purposes must be bought by the Government from somebody who has it. I shall not argue here against confiscating in the hands of the commission man or a seed house. That would be exceedingly popular in many places. It is possible the Senate would pass such a measure if that naked paragraph alone should be submitted to it. As to its validity or justice I do not care to say anything. But to say nothing of the precedent established, that would be only a portion of the supply needed for New England, the Western, and the Southwestern States. There will be a necessity for raising some products following on the general crop that will fail or partly fail by harvest time. We realize that, all of us. Anything that will promote filling that deficiency ought to be enacted. I have no criticism for anything of that kind, but the very remedy sought to be had by such a measure as this will defeat the end in view. Just as soon as it is known that the Government is taking from all the seed houses, from those who have any warehouses, anything fit for seeds, every original producer will keep what he has. You can not talk to me about what you are going to do with the farmer who raises it. Of all the sorghum, the millet, the corn, the wheat, the rye, the barley, and the whole list of cereals that produce either forage for animals or food for man, the larger part will be found at last when you go to the country that produces it.

If you wish to establish a precedent here by legislation of going into the hands of the original producer and taking it away from him, I wish to say, with all deference to Senators from the arid and semiarid regions of the Southwest and from the largely nonagricultural region of New England, when you have done that I know the western farmer well enough to know that he will take his hand off the plow handle, and he will say, "You can conscript my son; that is the power of war; but you can not come into my field and tell me how to work and take my corn, potatoes, and wheat away from me." Try it if you want to, and see where you will get to.

Mr. FALL and Mr. PAGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico. He rose first.

Mr. FALL. At the close of the Senator's remarks I am going to ask to insert in the RECORD the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made on May 2 with reference to this matter, and which I think largely resulted in this proposed legislation. But I wish now to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the condition as set forth in that speech as to the present monopolies of the seed sales in the United States is not in some way broken, where the farmers and the gardeners can not get more than 8 peas to plant for 5 cents and 15 radish seeds to plant for 5 cents—if something is not done, as was said at that time, as is now attempted to be done, to break that monopoly, the farmers will take their hands off the plow handle in New Mexico and the arid West will do something to those who are monopolizing the seed products of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield now to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that I would like to see some measure that may permit the Secretary of Agriculture or some agent to make requisition for seed, potatoes, and so forth; but I want to tell the Senator that so far as the bill that is before us now is concerned, and has been before the committee, the committee has not favored that kind of legislation, and that part of the bill, H. R. 4188, which provides for such requisition has been stricken out by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I do not think it is quite proper for the Senator to accuse them of having reported a bill here when they have eliminated the very feature to which the Senator is particularly opposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator would be correct if he followed the argument I have made to its conclusion. I am not criticizing in this connection the committee's proposal to buy grain or seed. That, I understand, will be left until some future time, when it shall be amended, in the hands of the dealers, commission men, feed houses, or persons who have accumulated and stored, after the seeds have left the hands of the original producers. What I have undertaken to say, and I probably will find it necessary to repeat it, is that after you have taken all that seed you will have fallen far short of giving relief to the parts of the country needing and supposed to need it, under the explanations that are made here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. I am interested in the statement made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] a moment ago in his colloquy with the Senator from Illinois, in which the Senator from New Mexico referred to the seed monopolists of the United States. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois—for I will say by way of parenthesis I observe the Senator from New Mexico has just been called from the Chamber—whether he knows of any large quantity of seed that has been gathered together by any companies or individuals so that they can be said to have monopolized it. Does the Senator from Illinois know such to be the fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not. If there were such a one, I believe that under existing law the Attorney General of the United States or the attorney general of the State in which it existed, if it did not go beyond the limit of the State, would have a complete remedy.

Mr. REED. Under the Sherman Act?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, a good many statements have been made here that I should like to see run down, or see their truth or their falsity shown. If it is true that men have gathered large quantities of seed so that they in fact are able to a considerable extent to control the market or monopolize the market, I want to know that fact. I think the country ought to know it. I think the Department of Justice ought to know it. I think that very radical measures would be justifiable. But if such things do not exist, if there is nothing going on in the country except the usual performance of the seedsman who gets a little envelope and puts a lot of pretty pictures on the outside and very few seeds on the inside and sells them to the housewife who plants a little patch 6 or 8 feet square in the back lots of a town—if it is just that old system of petty larceny that has been going on by a certain class of seedsmen for years, it is quite a different thing. I should like to get at the fact. The Senator from Illinois tells me that he can not give me any information about it. I should like to ask any other Senator here, if I may be permitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to yield to any Senator who can furnish the desired information.

Mr. REED. I should like to be informed if any Senator here knows anyone who possesses a seed monopoly. If there is no such thing as a seed monopoly, we ought to quit talking about it; if there is a seed monopoly, it ought to be exposed. I thank the Senator for allowing me to interrupt him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the inquiry by the junior Senator from Missouri is in point and on a very material subject. I know of no seed monopoly. I know of a number of seed houses in the West and in the Northwest, especially one large one in Chicago, the Albert Dickinson Co., that has been in business for more than 40 years. I know some farther east, some of whom have been in business for 70 years. I know a certain place in an eastern State where many of the farmers in central and southern Illinois send for buckwheat seed. They had rather have that seed than what they raise on their own soil. Its price will be higher this year. That is not because anybody has cornered buckwheat, nor has the appetite increased for buckwheat cakes for future delivery. It is only in keeping with the general trend of events as to everything else. You had just as well go out and indict the men who have buckwheat or insist here in the Senate Chamber that there is a buckwheat monopoly.

If there is a seed monopoly, and it has violated any interstate-commerce law, and it can be reached by the Attorney General, I do not think there will be a voice raised in this Chamber against prosecuting them and imposing upon them the full penalty of the law. I believe I shall be within the limits to say that there is no seed monopoly. There are seed houses holding their products for about the same advance found in other kinds of merchandise, and that is about as far as you can trace it. Some of the largest houses do not proportionately advance prices. They encourage production.

It is true you can get eight peas for 5 cents in New Mexico, but I paid 25 cents for a drink of water in New Mexico one time, and that is the price of two martinis in the effete cities where such refreshments are abundant and accessible. You had just as well infer from that incident that the price of water ought to be regulated, and that the Government ought to go into the water-system business in New Mexico. There is not anything, when it is scarce, the price of which does not go up. New England does not raise enough foodstuffs to be self-supporting. It has been that way for a good many years—ever since men began to leave the New England farms and drift into the cities and since our industrial system has developed. That is not because you can not do it, but it is because you have nobody to produce the articles or to work the farms. That is the difficulty and it will continue for a long time. It will not be reached by any such fancied remedies as appropriating a few million dollars to buy seed. It is further back than that.

There is a lady up in my part of the town—not a member of my family, but who visits us occasionally—who is not complaining about the high prices of seed, but in her particular line of society there is wailing and gnashing of teeth because dog biscuits have gone up 20 cents a box. They are not a luxury; they are a necessity in canine society.

What the Senator from Missouri said about the petit larceny practice, with an alluring envelope, with a many-colored engraving on it of a very pleasant looking market gardener, rotund and well kept, taking his product to market, or a picture of something running up a pole, which is supposed to be a leguminous plant, and getting an extraordinary price for it, is nothing but what has been practiced for years.

I have a sort of an illuminating flash that likely this is because of the free-seed distribution that causes the annual debate in this body about its propriety. I voted to discontinue that, I think, not because it may not have some economic and food value but because it has yielded enough to the humor of the country. Let the editor rest; give the wits and spring poets a chance to recuperate. As a subject for legislative action, it has long since ceased to be anything but a great national joke. I sent some cabbage seeds last year to one of my constituents. His good housewife planted them and raised a fine crop of jimson weeds. It is such things as that that shake the average farmer's belief in the processes of self-government. He is not thinking so much about defending this country against autocracy as he is about getting good cabbage seeds from a paternal Government next time.

I come back to the old question—with due apologies to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]—and it may not be germane to this particular section, that after the supply of seeds in the hands of seed houses and dealers, including the local corner grocery store, shall have been exhausted, where will the Government get the rest of them? I think I know where the great bulk of the grain of this country is. That bulk is not in the hands to-day of commission men, of elevators, of alleged "infamous brokers," of members of grain exchanges—it is not in their hands, but it is in the hands of the original producers. If there were freight facilities in this country now, the food products of the country would reach the great centers of population. That lack of freight facilities is what is the matter. It will not be cured by appropriating a million or so of dollars or two and a half million dollars, if the entire sum be left in, simply to buy seeds.

To begin with, the Government must store the seeds. I can take many of the experts out of the Agricultural Department—hit or miss—and they can not tell me on the floor of the Senate Chamber this afternoon what seeds they can buy and store and hold open that will sprout the spring of 1918, and those that are perennial and can be kept year after year. Some seeds die within the year; they will not germinate if they are carried over. Some seeds are good indefinitely, so long as they are kept dry. Seed wheat, if it is kept in a proper place, and insects—weevils and the like—are kept away from it, will germinate a thousand years after it is stored. Wheat originally came from the Nile. Senators will remember the old story of the Pyramids; how somebody, examining one of the mummies, found a little vessel full of wheat that was to furnish him rations on his journey to the next world. Out of curiosity the Englishman took a few grains of wheat to his home with him. This belonged to a dynasty in Egyptian history when the cuneiform inscriptions were written, more than 4,000 years before the wheat was deposited in that vessel. The Englishman planted it, and it grew and produced "after its kind."

There are other kinds of grain that after the first season are utterly worthless for seed purposes; they will not germinate. As an illustration, you have got to take the timothy seed in its prime. If you want to raise a crop of forage of that form, after the second year, while some of the seed will germinate, it will not be in sufficient quantity; it begins to lose its germinating power the second year.

After all this is done, after the seed has been confiscated in the hands of the seedsman and those who have stored it—if there is any monopoly get after them—after that has been done, you go finally to the producer to get grain. How much of a remedy will you find when you approach the producer? How will you make him sell it? Assume, now, that the war power exists, and you can make him sell a surplus of 50 bushels or 5,000 bushels that he has in his bins. Winter wheat must generally be used in the neighborhood of somewhere near the same latitude where it is grown. Winter wheat being sowed in the fall of the year, it does not do well to take winter wheat from Kentucky and put it in northern Illinois, for it does not produce well there, and you are apt to have a failure of the crop. Wheat must acclimatize itself. So we always take wheat out of the same latitude, or approximately within a degree or a degree and one-half of latitude to sow in that particular wheat field.

After you have taken the seed away from the producer, under the war power, what will you do next? You will store it and keep it. This year's crop, except only a very limited quantity of forage grains, is in the ground, or it is too late for the Government to buy seed and get it to the producer. If the Government does not move with more celerity than it ordinarily does, it might be well enough to give a small appropriation this year, and it might possibly get to it by next spring—a year from now. That would be as fast as we could expect anything to be done in the name of the Government. Possibly there would be some value in that for future purposes; but so far as the great areas for producing food for the Southwest, for New England, and for the great centers of population are involved in this controversy, the time has passed. The forage crops largely of northern Oklahoma, though not to such an extent, but almost entirely of Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Illinois, and a very large portion of Wisconsin have been killed. Last winter was of extraordinary severity. The forage crops that are perennial in character will be very short. The alfalfa is dead; the clover has been frozen out; the timothy crop will not be half a crop; the red-top crop is dead. To get any seed to farmers on those areas by this appropriation is a piece of supernal folly; it can not be done.

There is only one thing left, and that is for farmers to sow something else in place of the crops of forage that have been killed. They can substitute cowpeas and certain other crops, but the cowpeas wherever they can be used are already found in sufficient quantity to furnish the farmer who wants to substitute that kind of forage.

There is the corn crop, which is the great crop of Nebraska and of the region reaching all the way from the alkali plains on the foothills of the Rocky Mountains to the slopes of the Alleghenies on the east. That is the corn-producing area, 1,200 miles from east to west, and 800 miles, roughly speaking, from north to south. Corn must take the place of a large quantity of failed forage and other crops to care for the animals, not only those used in farming operations, but those producing the meat for the country. There is nothing in this bill which would do any good as to that crop. Seed corn is not a scarce article. All over the great corn belt, in the whole area of its growth, there is enough seed corn; there is no dearth of it, requiring extraordinary action by the Government or the exercise of war powers. What we need to exercise more than anything else is some power over the War Department, the Agricultural Department, the Navy Department, and the Department of Commerce, together with the Council of National Defense, so that there will not be quite so much misspent energy and so much danger of discouraging or lessening the productive power of the farmer in the areas I am describing.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not been able to be present while this bill was under discussion, owing to meetings of the Finance Committee, of which I am a member, and so I am not familiar with the reasons that have been put forth for the passage of a bill requiring the purchase and storing of seed by the Government. Has any Senator on the floor presented any case where there was a lack of opportunity to purchase seed in the States?

Mr. SHERMAN. There have been general statements that seeds could not be obtained, and I think the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] stated that it was extremely difficult to obtain certain seeds needed in certain parts of the arid and semi-arid regions in the Southwestern States.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understand that in those sections of the country they do not raise a sufficient amount of foodstuffs for their own use, that they always have to purchase seed from the outside; but what I was wondering was whether there has been shown in this debate a lack of seed material throughout the United States and inability to obtain that seed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to state this, inasmuch as the question has been brought up several times——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me for just a moment, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] called attention to the shortage of seed potatoes in certain parts of New England, and stated that those who had the seed potatoes were holding them for prices that were prohibitive. That is the only specific illustration I recall.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Reference has been made several times here this afternoon while I have been in the Chamber to seed houses and to the fact that possibly those seed houses were playing a "confidence game" upon the people. My attention was called to that matter by a speech delivered in the Senate, I think, by the Senator from Utah some time ago, in which he referred to the fact that packages of seed which were sent out by some of the seed houses were in the nature of a snare and a delusion; that the seeds were not there. Now, there is a very large seed concern in the metropolis of the Senator's State, as there is in Detroit, Mich.—the Ferry Seed Co. I think it is universally conceded that the Ferry Seed Co., at least, has not taken advantage of the higher prices of seed to diminish the number of seeds in the packages. I received the other day from one of the local dealers a package of peas put up by the D. M. Ferry Co.—and that was the character of seeds to which the Senator referred—and, instead of having eight peas in it, it was literally packed with peas that were useful and were known to be good for productive quality.

I do not care so much about that, however, as I do to call attention to the fact that in the State of Michigan we have an organization, through one of the departments of the State, which is looking after the seed question for all of our people. A census has been taken, or is being taken, in the State not only of all of the people who live there, but of all their property, including grains and seeds of all kinds. So our people know where the seeds are, and they have no difficulty in obtaining them for their own use, and in obtaining them in large quantities for shipment elsewhere if people outside of the State desire them. My question, therefore, was for the purpose of determining what was the cause of this demand at this time that the Government shall go into the seed business if the wants of the people can now be supplied from the usual sources.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the charge has been made quite frequently that there was a seed monopoly. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made inquiry specifically whether any Senator could give information on that point. An appropriate interval was given in the Senate Chamber, but no one responded. I take it that there is no such thing as a seed monopoly in the United States. There is a rise in prices, evidently. It would be phenomenal if that were not so, because everything else has risen in price.

There is a very large seed house—more than one, for that matter, but a very large one particularly—the Albert Dickinson Co., in Chicago, which I remember 40 years ago. There is no extortion practiced by that house, any more than by D. M. Ferry Co., of Detroit. They have been in business, like the Ferry Co., for many years, and they expect to continue in business. They always sell at a reasonable price, and, so far as I am informed, up to within a week ago the house in Chicago was filling every order for seeds that came in.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the Senator, since the Senator has made the statement that other prices than those of foodstuffs have advanced, and as I made a somewhat similar statement myself a day or two ago, in illustration of the advance in prices, I should like to call attention to a circular which the receiver of the Missouri Pacific Railway Co. has sent to the employees of the road under date of May 15, 1917. In this circular the receiver, Mr. Bush, appeals to all the employees to exercise every possible economy and to save in every way they can, because of the very high prices being exacted for those things the railroad needs to use. I think the statement is illuminating at this point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad to have it.

Mr. REED. I desire to put the entire circular in the RECORD, with the permission of the Senator——

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. REED. But I desire to read and to call attention to this statement:

> Prices continue to advance at an alarming rate. Note prices prevailing to-day compared with prewar prices:
> Material and supplies, chargeable to operation, excepting rail, ties, fuel, and ballast, in 1916 cost approximately $8,000,000.
> The same material and supplies at current market prices would cost approximately $12,000,000—50 per cent increase.
> Stationery alone, in 1916, cost approximately $452,000.
> Same amount of stationery, at current market prices, would cost approximately $746,000—65 per cent increase.

Some of the items are given. I will read a few of them and give the percentage of increase:

	Per cent increase.

I shall not read the rest of it, but the figures all through tell the same story. If that is true with reference to these various articles, which have nothing to do with food, nothing to do with wheat or wheat corners, but are for the most part made out of things that exist in the earth, where nature's supply is inexhaustible—iron, copper, lead, and lumber, which, while it is not inexhaustible, the supply is far from exhausted yet—is it not a complete answer to the cry that foodstuffs are cornered, and does it not show that there is a general advance in prices at least in this country?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has already asked to have a certain table inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be glad to have it done, if no objection is made.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as the matter of seed has been referred to, perhaps I may say that I am conversant with the course of business in seeds, because I am a large purchaser from the Dickinson firm of Chicago. I think their business is materially different from that of Ferry & Co., of Detroit, who sell quite largely—perhaps not entirely—in the little packages that are sold around the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. For market gardening more particularly. The Dickinson Co. handle field seeds.

Mr. PAGE. Yes; but the firm of Dickinson & Co. are very large handlers of seed in large quantities. I believe they are a very honorable concern, and I have not the slightest doubt that they are selling their seeds at a fair, and only a fair, profit. I believe, however, that their dealings are so large that in some respects they are controlling. In other words, if Dickinson & Co. make the price of seed in Chicago $3 per hundred, practically all the other concerns dealing in seeds meet that price. Now, I do not think I should do right in saying that in any respect they are monopolists, for I do not think they are, nor am I criticizing them, because I have great respect for the firm; but I believe that they are so large, as the Senator knows, that their prices are followed quite largely by the large seed concerns of the other sections of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is only by sympathy, Mr. President, that other concerns would follow, out of prudence. The house is an old one in the western country. I remember when Albert Dickinson & Co. were doing business as a copartnership. The house was founded by Albert Dickinson. After his death, possibly before, it was incorporated, and is now the Albert Dickinson Co. They not only do not have anything approaching a monopoly but there are a hundred seed houses, some of them I think in volume quite equal to the one named.

There is this much of the element of influence on monopoly, the same that goes along with every old, well-established house that has dealt fairly with its customers for nearly half a century—that like a copyright or like a trade-mark or a name, if it possesses no exclusive qualities by law, a name built up by honorable dealings through a long course of years will always possess influence not only among the purchasers of their products but all who are dealing in a like product will necessarily conform to the prices and the methods of doing business of this concern. Now, beyond that I do not think the particular house in question exerts any influence, and I am certain none that could be in contravention of any laws against trade restraints or against monopolies. Its influence is a good one rather than otherwise.

I come back to the original question, and I think it is directly related to this paragraph—that at last the Government must buy of the producer; and that is the question which at last we must solve in the Senate. I have heard no satisfactory solution of that problem offered. That is the reason I referred to the statement made last Saturday in the address by the very capable junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. He realizes the difficulties as the rest of us do. He calls attention to the high price of food in the cities. That is inevitable. It will continue as long as certain conditions attending production continue. I know the reason. It will not be cured by legislation. Just as long as the industrial enterprises of the country draw the help from the farm, that will continue.

It seems a little bit amusing, to a man who knows conditions in the western and northwestern grain and stock-raising areas, to talk about conscripting the city man and sending him out into the fields to raise grain, and in the grazing country and dairy country to milk cows and feed steers and attend to the ordinary incidents of live-stock production. I instance one man in Illinois who is a farmer and stock raiser—he, his father, and grandfather before him. Now, he and some very philanthropic people in Chicago heeded the cry that farm help was short. They had been reading glowing articles in periodicals about the "back-to-the-farm" movement; and a lot of good people in Chicago who have leisure time and some money were engaged in a philanthropic movement to direct some of this misspent energy out to the farm, where it might do some good and make a greater food supply for the famishing hordes in Chicago that the Senator from New Hampshire referred to on Saturday.

They came out, and thereby hangeth a tale. They stayed about two months, and then the city dweller hied him back to Chicago, with the statement, one of them who spoke for the crowd, "Never again for him."

First, Mr. President, you could not get them up in the morning for a farmer's breakfast. Then one of them went out across the road and inquired of a farmer plowing in the adjoining field where he could find a restaurant. Another inquired for a daily paper; and yet another, when he had finished a very reasonable day's work from a farmer's viewpoint, asked if there were any moving-picture shows in the vicinity that could be reached by a night ride. What is needed is somebody who knows how and will work. The tribe is dying out.

That is what is the matter with the dweller in the city. His habits are not like ours out in the country. He works union hours. I wish some old, hard-headed farmer could get over in the Department of Agriculture here, or in some of the other departments headed by other members of the Cabinet. I wish he could talk to the union-labor members of the National Defense Council. You undertake to raise crops on an 8-hour-a-day basis and find out how far you will get with it. You undertake to raise crops by a city man who is not country broken to work and find out how far you travel in that direction. That is a story by itself. I only allude to it. It is a subject for a whole afternoon, because it has taken 50 years for that condition to grow, and it could only be sketched in its merest details in human language by appropriating a whole afternoon to it on the floor of the Senate Chamber; but it exists.

You can legislate about free seeds and about Government seed houses indefinitely, and it will not cure the underlying condition that has produced the high prices. It is not war alone. War is only a contributing cause. It is because the help has gone from the farm; it has gone to the factory, to the counting house, to the store, to the great manufacturing, jobbing, and retail centers of the country. These men have gone because they like the work and get higher wages and shorter hours. They have more amusements. City life is more attractive to the average young person. The result is that the farm is drained.

What do you want to do now? Conscript the farmer, conscript his boys off the farm, and go by the arm of the Federal Government into the grain bin and confiscate everything he has raised. I want to serve due and timely warning upon Congress now that when you undertake that you will hear something that will be more than a mere puling infant cry or a ground swell in some particular locality.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. REED. Can not the Senator, who speaks so eloquently about conscripting the farmer's boy and taking him away, see that that is all to be made up to the farmer by conscripting one of these town fellows that wants to see moving pictures and taking him out to the farm to work there?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, Mr. President, theoretically no doubt, as the Senator will agree with me, that is adequate compensation; but some of these same people I am talking about that went to the farm named could not milk a cow. They did not know a cow's udder from any other portion of her anatomy; and after one of them was switched in the eyes he was hors de combat that evening for all dairying and farm-work purposes. If he does not fight any better than he milks cows, the Kaiser will rule in this land before the end of the war.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, coming to a serious matter, I am concerned about the size of this appropriation for seeds. Two million five hundred thousand dollars, I believe, is recommended, and I am wondering how it is proposed to spend it.

Last year we put in, in this country, 106,000,000 acres of corn, 52,000,000 acres of wheat, 40,000,000 acres of oats, 3,000,000 acres of rye, and 7,000,000 acres of barley. If wheat costs $2 a bushel, it will take about $4 worth of wheat to sow an acre. If you expended the whole sum of this appropriation for seed wheat, you would sow 1 acre out of 41 that is now sown to wheat. How is this $2,500,000 to be spread out so that it will be thin enough to reach all parts of the country? In a word, is it not an absolutely ridiculous and absurd proposition to appropriate $2,500,000 to buy seeds of all kinds for a country like the United States? Is it not like going out to water a thousand head of cattle with a quart cup?

Mr. SHERMAN. It certainly is, Mr. President. I do not think the magnitude of the undertaking is at all appreciated by those who are responsible for this section of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield; certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. From what I could understand from the explanation that has been made in favor of it, quite a large amount of it is to be used in organization. Now, just what "organization" means, unless it is putting a lot of additional men on the pay roll, I do not know; but I think that is one explanation of the size of the appropriation—that we are to "organize" so as to buy these seed and store them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has placed his finger on the vital spot of the "organization." It is a pay roll. That is what it will be here. There will be more men on the pay roll, speaking figuratively, than there will be individual seeds furnished to the producer. It is the same old story.

The question recurs of how to get the seed out of the hands of the producer. It will all come back to that; and the House bill, which I suppose is the same bill reported here a moment ago, realizes that difficulty. Either the legal obstacle or the economic obstacle is sought to be avoided by exempting the producers from the operation of the bill. You may conscript or confiscate it, if you want to, take it way with a grossly inadequate price from the farmer after he has put it in the crib or the bin. Concede under war powers, for the purposes of the argument, that that can be done. I will argue that some other day if it becomes necessary. After you have done that once to a farmer, I venture to say you will never do it again to a farmer that lives in my State. You may undertake to, but he will have raised enough to feed his own family and his efforts will cease at that point. If you make him do anything else, you will conscript him into the Army and turn him into a farmer instead of a soldier.

That is one thing that will be indispensable if we obtain sufficient supplies to carry out the avowed object of this section. The inquiry made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] disposes of the practical end of it with $2,500,000. It is a drop in the bucket—hardly that. It does not even make a damp place.

I apprehend that the only purpose of this would be, as the Senator suggested, to put a number of people on the pay roll. If I had to make further specific objection to an undertaking of this kind it would be that that kind of an organization is the only thing that will bear any fruit.

Let me call attention to some things that are being done now under the guise of war powers, under the plea of necessity. Anything can be done under an imperious plea of that nature. The Council of National Defense has so arranged transportation and the delivery of certain products that a farmer to-day can not buy, in all the destroyed area of the winter-wheat country of the West, the machine he needs to seed the ground in corn. There is an implement called a lister that is used to plant corn. It is a breaking plow and a corn planter combined. They sell at $65 ordinarily, and could be sold at that if one were found in an agricultural implement dealer's shed, or if they could be put out by the manufacturer. In all this destroyed area where the wheat is winterkilled there is one paying crop that will come in within the next 90 to 120 days as a part of the grain supply. That is the corn. Corn is worth many things as a food article. One hundred and five merchantable products are made from corn. I referred to the great area a while ago. I have been told by authorities, not from the Agricultural Department, but those who are connected with the great agricultural implement houses of the country, that in the case of the winter-wheat area in Kansas, the greater part of Missouri, Nebraska, and Illinois, at least one-half the area must be plowed up or devoted to some other crop. The Council of National Defense have so interfered with the producing capacity of the great agricultural-implement factories of my country that they are unable to sell sufficient machines of the kind needed to seed the destroyed winter-wheat area in corn. That is the first visible result of the misguided activities of some of these legal or extra-legal bodies that are attempting to prepare this country for a mighty war.

I would a great deal rather not make any of these criticisms; but if we are to avoid similar mistakes in the future we must tell about it. Instead of being able to produce the grain, every time we enlarge a governmental activity, every time we undertake to do something, one department invades the territory of another and duplicates the work, and both of them or all of them interfere with the productive capacity of the country.

I have heard a phrase repeated many times on the floor of the Senate since the 2d day of April last until I am tired of hearing it. It is that "the Government must coordinate its activities," when we have been coordinating our activities until we have literally exhausted our energies in coordinating ourselves.

The more we coordinate our activities the less capable we become, and this Government has so coordinated its activities that when I think of it it reminds me of a man with an attack of St. Vitus's dance. The only thing that always emerges serene, triumphant, and indestructible from "coordinating" is an appropriation and a pay roll. There has not been one great productive energy of this country, from the farmer clear through to the manufacturer, who has not been disabled and his ability to produce impaired by the ill-conceived efforts of governmental departments. Let it be continued for 30 days more, or continued for 6 months—30 days will begin to produce the results, and 6 months will produce more of them—and not only will there be a cessation of the normal volume of production, but along with the revenue bill pending, as it passed the House, unless it be materially amended in this body, there will be such a burden to carry with these interferences with the normal activities of industrial life that we will not be able to command in war 50 per cent of the energies of this Republic that we had before the declaration passed this body.

There is another branch of this which I wish, in due time, to comment upon that will more properly come in the succeeding paragraph, carrying operations for other purposes of an educational and farm-demonstration character. When we get to that I have some remarks, if time permits, which I desire to offer. I think they are very material, but I wish here to place on record my protest against the unwarrantable interference, the lack of coordination, the chaotic condition, and the insuperable obstacles placed in the way of the producer of anything in private life. Heap upon him the implied threat there is in this bill that at last you must go to the producer of seeds and take, by fixing a minimum price by governmental action, all he has; and avow that this early, and see whether or not it increases production. It is only a symptom of the general disease. It seems like we are in a form of confiscating hysteria.

Whether or not we ought to be governed by martial law, I shall not now discuss. I have my own opinion about it. I think we still ought to be governed by ordinary conditions and the civil administration under the laws of our country. If it becomes necessary, on a given state of facts, martial law may be declared by the Executive. Until that is done we had better let the private citizen go along, interfering with him as little as possible.

Here are these men at the heads of departments. Are they all-wise or omniscient? On the Council of National Defense are a number of gentlemen who are experts in their line. Nobody knows any more about some one thing than they do. One knows all about automobiles; another knows all about electricity; another knows all about ores, and especially about iron and steel, and so on through the list. They are a good deal like specialists, expert doctors, and just like expert lawyers or specialists in some other line. We all have had the same experience with them. If you want to get good results, you had better watch an expert closer, you had better be more vigilant in getting what you want, than with anybody else under the sun. The expert or specialist cuts a deep but an exceedingly narrow groove, and he never sees anything beyond the horizon of his particular line of effort.

We have a national council of experts. What are they doing? The very best they can. They are making sacrifices. They are men highly paid in private life. They are working either for no salary at all or inadequate salaries, compared with private incomes. I do not question their motives. What I do question is that unless "we coordinate our activities"—to use the pet phrase—in a better and more sensible way than we have done up to this time, I would rather be hit in the head with a policeman's billy than have my activities coordinated by such a body and in such a way.

The only reason why I offer these criticisms in connection with this paragraph is because it is a symptom, as I suggested, of the general disease. I know that everybody who raises his hand against legislation of this kind will be immediately stigmatized as an enemy of food control. It will be said that he is fighting a decrease in the high cost of living.

I am taking that chance. There is more ridiculous misinformation sent abroad on this subject than anything I ever saw. I saw a few days ago a statement that in a given time there were only 200 tons of garbage collected in Chicago where in the same time preceding 500 tons had been collected. It was argued at once that the people in Chicago were eating the other 300 tons of garbage and that the times were very hard indeed. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] quoted the statement, which is the same one I saw, that 1,500 more people had died in a given period of time than in a like time preceding it. Therefore the 300 tons of garbage consumed by Chicago citizens, at least impliedly from what he said, caused their death. First, the mere fact of 1,500 people dying in Chicago within a given time more than at some other like preceding time would only indicate that down in the Loop district there were more activities of the gentlemen who live by their wits prowling about than some other given period, or that there had been more than the normal number of riots.

What can be said about the decrease in 300 tons of garbage? I have heard that mentioned several times in private conversation and impliedly here in several arguments. I think that indicates a very great improvement in the economical condition of Chicago. There were 300 tons less garbage. What became of it? It did not get into the garbage cans. Then what happened? What became of it if it did not get into the garbage cans? They ate it, certainly, and they ought to eat it. They ought to eat it in Washington. They ought to eat it in New York, and everywhere else.

I think I have investigated everything around this city like every countryman does, out of pure curiosity, if for nothing else. I have gone down the alleys in Washington in the morning and looked at garbage cans. I have seen whole loaves of bread go into garbage cans in the city of Washington. I have seen the same thing in Chicago. I have seen beef by the pound after pound going into the cans. I have seen a half chicken, I have seen cold potatoes by the ton, more or less, that have gone into the garbage cans. Do you know the reason why there were 300 tons less of garbage in Chicago at the time named? It is because the housewife in the stress of affairs has gone into the kitchen and the servants and hired help are doing less wasting of provisions in that family than they did before. This is practical food conservation. It ought to be done all the time.

Mr. CALDER. Now that the Senator has arrived at that conclusion in his remarks, I will state that I am informed that in the city of Rochester, which is the third largest city in New York State, where the city owns the garbage-disposal plant, last year it returned to the city treasury a profit of $4,000 a month, while for the first five months of this year, because of the care of the housekeepers or the housewives of that city, the disposal plant has hardly paid for itself. I am also informed that the same condition prevails in the city of New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator's statement is valuable. It lends strength to the suggestions I am making. The subject of potatoes would have something to do with the decrease in the garbage. In the northwestern part of the town they had some kind of school exercises in a public school a month ago and they had the little child's story Cinderella acted. Of course, she not only had to have the crystal slipper, but she had to have a string of pearls around her neck. In lieu of pearls some keen-witted schoolgirl thought of using a string of potatoes, which took the place of pearls of great price. I can get more lemons for a nickel at my grocery than I can get onions.

The housewife has gone into the kitchen. There are no cold potatoes thrown away and going to waste. The theory of the boarding-house mistress of 40 years ago, when I lived in a boarding house, was about right. The boys used to pass over the potatoes when they were boiled with the skins on. A fellow would shake his head and say, "No; not any potatoes to-day." Another would say, "You might just as well eat one; you have got to eat it some time anyhow; better take it while it is fresh." If you did not eat it that way, you would eat it when it was fried. If you did not eat it when it was a mashed potato, you ate it as potato cake the next morning. If you did not eat the beef the day it was boiled or roasted, you would eat it sometime in the future more or less remote in the form of hash and onions. But we were just as healthy on the boarding-house diet as we are now on the diet in Washington.

It is all the rankest kind of folly for us to talk about making successful war on Germany on the basis we have been living for the last 15 or 20 years. Germany, with over 70,000,000, with her naturally less fertile soil than ours and inhospitable climate the greater part of the year, will defeat us in the economical side of this question unless we change our habits, nationally, of living. We are the great prodigals of the world, the spendthrifts of the centuries, and we have been for years. We can not pit ourselves against the limited resources even of Germany, with her conservation and her economy, and expect to win. We must begin in the housewife's kitchen, and the first encouraging sign I have seen is the fact that there were 300 tons less garbage in Chicago, New York, and Rochester than there were in a like period preceding it. We must continue that.

There is no danger of famine in this country if we live as we ought to live. If we live in the old free-handed, spendthrift way, we are headed for trouble. Consider the tremendous price to be paid in this war, whatever it shall be, when the toll of blood shall have been taken, when the taxgatherers shall have visited us in our generation for the rest of our lives and we bequeath a mighty debt to posterity; when all that is done we can set off on the other side of it that, if we have learned the first great lesson in economy and of living so as to get a hundred cents of value out of things that the God of nature has given us at the beginning, we have something to compensate for the great sacrifices we have made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 it is proposed to strike out the paragraph contained in lines 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, etc., $2,500,000.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw for the present my amendment for the purpose of offering the following amendment to the paragraph: To strike out, on page 5, line 18, all the words after the word "act," and then all of lines 19, 20, and 21.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator wants to exclude from his amendment the appropriation of $2,500,000.

Mr. MCKELLAR. For the present I will exclude the appropriation of $2,500,000. That is my first amendment. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my former amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment to strike out lines 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I now move to strike out all the words in line 18 after the word "act" and all of lines 19 and 20, and all of line 21 down to the figures "$2,500,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the paragraph so as to read:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act, $2,500,000.

Mr. GORE. I will state, as chairman of the committee, the committee agreed on that amendment this morning in the House bill which was before it. I hope therefore the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. For information I should like to have the paragraph read as it stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 2 of this act, $2,500,000.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I now move to strike out, in line 21, on page 5, the figures "$2,500,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,000,000"; and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 21, strike out "$2,500,000" and insert "$1,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On agreeing to this amendment the Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent, to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have a pair with that Senator, and withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES. Has the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. In the absence of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

So Mr. MCKELLAR'S amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 5, line 25, to strike out "$4,500,000" and insert "$3,000,000," so as to read:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $3,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. The pending amendment before the Senate, in the paragraph on page beginning with line 22 and ending with line 25, is to strike out "$4,500,000" and insert "$3,000,000." It is an appropriation for increasing the food production and eliminating waste and promoting the conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if the appropriation that has already been made for demonstration work is not sufficient for carrying on this work in all parts of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The appropriation made in the agricultural college extension bill increases gradually until 1922, but the Department of Agriculture felt that this proposed increased appropriation used for this year would enable the department to bring returns and be of substantial service in view of the exigency which is at this time upon the country. It was the desire of the department to have, as the Senator will see, a larger appropriation than the committee gave. The figures $4,500,000 came from the department and we allowed $3,000,000. The Secretary and the officers of the department believe that they can use this fund to largely stimulate the production of foodstuffs. It is simply a part of the bill as framed, we not giving the department much more than half that was asked. This is to aid the department in complying with what it hopes to do along the line of stimulating and increasing the production of foodstuffs in view of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator understand that the $3,000,000 that is appropriated will be divided among the agricultural colleges of the country and be an increased appropriation to those colleges for demonstration work?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No and yes. The department has a special fund, I think of $600,000, that it uses independent of the colleges of agriculture and of the agricultural college extension act, but that fund is used in complete cooperation with the colleges. This fund will be used in cooperation with the colleges with a view of putting demonstrators in the sections which the fund heretofore appropriated does not enable them to reach.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. I would just like to inject a word or two into the colloquy now going on. I ask the Senator if it is not also the purpose to use this special fund in cooperation with the States which are now every one of them preparing for extraordinary work in their own boundaries, that it is to be used more directly in cooperation with the State agents and with agricultural colleges, and further that it is for the purpose of employing women workers in the conservation of foodstuffs by canning, housework, and so forth?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as my observation goes, the State colleges of agriculture and the Department of Agriculture are working in perfect cooperation. The instruction extends to specialists training in canning work as well as to farm demonstrators. It extends to the boys' corn club and to the boys' pig club.

It was the opinion of the department that they could bring about a great increase of food production if we give them this additional fund. They have now demonstrators in about one-third the counties in the United States. They have canning agents and teachers of domestic science in rural sections in a limited number of the counties, one agent covering a number of counties. The object is simply to increase and stimulate the effectiveness of that work in the coming year.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if in his judgment the appropriation of $3,000,000 can be spent efficiently for this purpose?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe it can.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator approves the appropriation of this additional $3,000,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do. I favored a little less than the department wanted, because I was afraid they could not use that much effectively, but this amount I believe will be beneficial. The House passed it at four and one-half million dollars.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, my attention has been called to this fact in connection with the proposed appropriation. The administration here called upon different governors of the States a short time ago to come to Washington or to send representatives here to formulate plans for cooperation between the departments of the Government and the different States in the Union. One of the suggestions which was made at that time was for closer cooperation between the States and the Agricultural Department or the Council for National Defense with reference to food products and conservation than now exists even under the extension act, and the appropriations made thereunder. That was one of the matters that was discussed.

The different States are applying more money generally than they have appropriated or applied under their acceptance of the provisions of the extension act for the work which has been spoken of. My State, for instance, has appropriated quite a large sum of money for cooperation with the National Government in exactly this work. It is to meet that extraordinary condition that this additional appropriation is asked.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. FALL. The Senator will permit me for just a moment. I know that in all other States, and in my own State particularly, they are organizing a force of women workers, volunteers, none of them receiving any money, to devote their time to conservation work of this character. It is for cooperation along those lines also that this sum is needed; and I understand it is badly needed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from New Mexico has just said what I was about to suggest to him; that this large force of people, not thoroughly experienced in the culture of the soil, are trying to do something in those lines, and the Agricultural Department feels that the increased force of demonstrators will help them greatly.

Mr. FALL. That is exactly the thought.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about this item, which, as it seems to me, is one of the most important items in the bill.

The Agricultural Department are very anxious for a larger appropriation; and out of the larger appropriation they expected to devote two and a half million dollars to the work of women agents teaching methods of conserving food throughout the country, which they estimated would result in a saving of 20 per cent of our food; $500,000 was to be devoted to the boys' pig clubs, for pig raising; and about $3,000,000 for the men agents. To put a farm demonstrator in every county in the United States has been the ambition of the Agricultural Department.

We laugh a good deal at farm demonstrators and talk about the city fellow and the college fellow coming out to teach the farmer how to farm. The Department of Agriculture attempt to get the best farmers they can get with scientific knowledge and an agricultural college knowledge, if possible, to act as demonstrators. We have in my State 27 farm demonstrators—county demonstrators. The county cooperates; the State cooperates; the local interest cooperates. For all the money the Government spends there is at least that much more which is contributed by the State or by the county or by the individual. The county demonstration work—laugh at it as some people may—has been a splendid thing in this country. The average age of these agents is over 31. They are not mere saplings just out of school.

Agriculture is becoming a great science. The great majority of farmers are anxious for this scientific investigation. There were over 3,500 farmers and their wives who came to the short course at our agricultural college in Iowa for one week last winter, paid their own expenses, and hired men to take care of the work at home. The farmers are anxious for all the information they can get along scientific agricultural lines. We had the Hessian fly in one part of our State some years ago, and the agricultural college was flooded with letters and telephone messages asking how to handle the situation. They sometimes have at that college—it is the greatest agricultural college in the world to-day—a thousand inquiries a day concerning matters that arise on the farm. It is not true, as has been so often stated, that the farmers are against this demonstration work. Our farmers have invested thousands of dollars in studying the proposition of better seed corn. They have devoted both time and money to that proposition. There are no more intelligent people on earth than the Iowa farmer and his wife.

I have in my hand a letter from an agent in Georgia as to some of the pig-club work in Georgia, and some pictures—which I can not, of course, put into the RECORD—showing the wonderful practical result of instructions that have been given in the State of Georgia. It is an interesting fact, and I think it is largely owing to that work—a statement which possibly the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will confirm—that Georgia's increase in hogs for last year was 237,000 head. That was the greatest increase in that variety of live stock of any State in the Union save one; and, of course, Georgia could not increase to the same extent as that State, the State of Iowa, which increased 301,000. Of course Iowa is in a class by itself as an agricultural State, but Georgia has gone into the second place in the increase of the production of hogs in this country. I believe it is largely due to the splendid work, cooperative in its nature, between the Federal Government and the State government in this farm demonstration work. I merely suggest that. We have cut this, in the interest of economy, perhaps below what we should—a million and a half dollars below what the other House has appropriated for this proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, confirming what the Senator from Iowa has just stated, we in Georgia began nearly eight years ago appropriating from the State treasury $50,000 a year, and have raised the appropriation from $50,000 a year to $100,000 for this work. Largely as a result of demonstration work, Georgia has risen from the tenth to the fourth State in the Union in her agricultural productions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if there is any one item in this bill which I think will bring benefit to our people, it is this item. I hope that this amount will not be reduced, as the committee recommends. There have been a great many requests coming from my State to my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] and myself urging increased appropriations, especially for farm demonstration work; and our people are very much interested in that work. They welcome the farm demonstrators; they have been trying to get more of them in the past than they have gotten, and they want an increased appropriation for this purpose. This is all the time of the Senate I am going to take. I hope the committee amendment will be voted down and that we shall leave the amount in the bill at $4,500,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I note this provision in the bill:

> For increasing food production * * * and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods—

There is appropriated so much money.

I agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that, if we are to appropriate a certain sum of money for these purposes, I should prefer the larger sum rather than the reduced amount, because if there is value in the investigation and the work to be done we ought to give what is fairly adequate; and I think even the amount as passed by the House is within limits.

So far as this paragraph is connected with the bill, I am in favor of it; but I wish to add these comments, and I hope that they will reach the department and the authorities in such a way as to produce results. Ordinary correspondence is useless; conversation is useless; visits to the department are useless. I made up my mind that the only thing to do is to incorporate this statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and give it such publicity as it may thereby obtain, if any results are to be produced.

Within 200 miles of the city of Chicago, if a radius be drawn of the surrounding country, 75 per cent of all the steel plows in the world are manufactured. In the city of Moline, Ill., and the adjacent municipalities which are not properly a part of that city, 60 per cent of all the steel plows in the world are made. I have seen their plows clear to the Tropics and below from the cities of Moline and of Rock Island. When I speak of Moline, I speak of the manufacturing district of which that place is the center.

There are 100,000 binders made by these factories and sold in the United States every 12 months. The greater part of them come from the Moline district, together with one other plant or series of plants in Chicago or its vicinity.

There are 80,000 corn planters made every 12 months in the area I have described. The manufacture of both binders and corn planters is largely from sheet steel. The machines can not be made without an adequate supply of sheet steel.

Not very long ago the Council of National Defense had a conference with the United States Steel Co. officials—without going into details—which resulted in the following arrangement or order: The United States Steel Co. notified the factories in the area I have just described that they must conduct their business until further notice with 50 per cent of their normal consumption of sheet steel. That means practically 50 per cent of the supply of self-binders for the United States; it means 50 per cent of the supply of corn planters for the United States. That is an impossibility and expect a full crop of food products.

The corn in the corn belt is not yet planted. It has been unseasonable, wet, cold, backward, and corn must be planted within the next 15 or 30 days, to put it at the extreme limit of the chances of a corn yield. Winter wheat will be half a yield.

I said on another occasion, commenting on another paragraph of this bill, that the great forage crops of the United States in at least five of the large producing States, beginning with northern Oklahoma and all of Kansas, and running up to and including the State of Nebraska, which are almost all perennial crops, have been totally destroyed by the severe preceding winter. That means one of two things. We must either be short of foodstuffs or we must get the full limit of the corn crop in this belt 1,200 miles long and about 800 miles from north to south. We must get the grain, and we must have the forage that comes from the blade, the top, and the shuck. That is indispensable. In the area where all the corn planters of the United States are produced, with a half supply of sheet steel, no more than a half production is possible. How were the farmers in the corn belt to be supplied under existing conditions? If it continue how will they be supplied next year? That, too, is an impossibility. Before long wheat and the other smaller cereals will be ready for the harvest. The normal number of 100,000 self-binders in this country, 95 per cent of which are produced in the area I have described, will be reduced 50 per cent.

What did the Council of National Defense say? What is said in the circular letter sent out by the steel company? That the farmer must conserve what he has; that he must get along with the old binder, with the old corn planter. The related industries using iron and steel in the manufacture of other agricultural implements within the same area I have described will consequently be affected in the same way, because rod steel, wrought iron, and all forms of iron and steel used in the manufacture of other agricultural implements must ultimately be affected by the same conditions. It is contemplated that additional orders be issued affecting other lines of the iron and steel trade which are vitally connected with the productive energies of the factories I have described.

These are the conditions: While we are attempting to prepare ourselves by raising food supplies in this country, unwittingly—I do not say it is intentional, because no body of men with the patriotic purpose of the Council of National Defense would for a moment think of such a thing, but whether intentional or otherwise, the results are just as damaging—they have interfered with the John Deer Co., the Moline Plow Co., with the Rock Island Co., with the International Harvester Co. and Parlin & Orendorf, and others in the area named, which contains the largest manufactures in the world in those lines.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Senator from Illinois had conversation with or heard by letter from the International Harvester Co. or the Deering Co. or obtained information at first hand in any other way to the effect that the order promulgated by the Council of National Defense reducing the amount of steel which they are to use would so curtail their production of agricultural implements as to interfere with supplying the needs of the farmers? Have any of these manufacturers advised the Senator personally that their failure to get steel with which to make these corn planters and other agricultural implements will result in limiting the crops of the farmers?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, did the representatives of those factories advise the Council of National Defense what would be the effect of their extraordinary order?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; they have been advised; and very recently the order has been modified so as to allow 75 per cent instead of 50 per cent of the normal output. The allowance of sheet steel has been increased by that much.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, we all understand the vital necessity of having steel with which to build battleships in these stormy times; we appreciate the necessity for ships to carry food and munitions to our allies across the sea. It will not be denied that steel in large quantities is needed in the manufacture of munitions, but it does seem to me that the matter of first necessity, even in war times, is something to eat. And for any man or body of men to promulgate an order limiting the manufacture of agriculture implements essential to the planting and cultivating of the farmers' crops is the ne plus ultra—the "utmost most"—of absurdity. It strikes me, Mr. President, that such an order is so utterly stupid as to be bordering onto crime. But the public mind is so inflamed and abnormal these days that I will not be surprised at almost anything that may happen. We probably ought to be thankful that it is no worse, however bad it may be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I quite agree with the Senator; and, as briefly as I can, I wish to present this condition, so that, if possible, there may be a loosening of these restrictions. On the presentation of the case there was a modification of the order, so that 75 per cent of the required sheet steel could be supplied to these factories, but that still leaves them 25 per cent short; that still leaves an inability to produce 25,000 binders and 20,000 corn planters.

These are practical matters that must be attended to. What is the use of building a fleet of vessels to carry food to the allies when there is no food produced in this country? Before food can be carried it must be produced. With the drainage of farm labor to the industrial centers there is only one remedy left for the farmer, and that is to use more machinery, more labor-saving and productive machinery, so that one hand can do more. The farmer must buy the new machinery.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I would like to suggest to the able Senator that there is probably more money for the manufacturer and contractor in shipbuilding than there is in making plows. There is no doubt but there is a whole lot of patriotism scattered about the country nowadays, but men can not be expected to change the habits of a lifetime on the spur of the moment. "When self the wavering balance shake" the figures are not always correct, although the purpose of the calculator may be fairly altruistic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, more than likely there is, because the manufacturers are selling on a very close margin the agricultural machinery to the farmer. After taking on certain Government contracts, with all the additional burdens of taking care of the agricultural-implement trade, suddenly they received a circular from the United States Steel Co. imposing these hardships.

I talked this morning with the representative of one of the largest companies. He has been here repeatedly, and appeared before the authorities, making his statement of what would result from such an order. So far the implement manufacturers have secured only the modification to which I have referred. I wish to state to the authorities here who have charge of this matter and to the different departments precisely what such an order means. I do not think we will reach the point of being in the clutch of famine. With ordinary good sense certainly we will not; but it will not be because of the Government that we will escape it; it will be because of the ability, industry, and resources of the people in private life that we escape it. I do not think there is one of the gentlemen on the Council of National Defense who, outside of his particular line, understands the far-reaching effect of the orders just entered. They have stopped the building-trade industry in my section of the country by prohibiting the shipping of crushed rock, lime, cement, bulky articles that are needed absolutely in road building, concrete making, in bridge building, in office building, in the construction of dwelling houses, and all the related lines of industry. That was the first order; that was order No. 1, and it tied up all that industry in my section of the country, and sent hundreds and thousands of men into temporary idleness, at least, unless the order can be rescinded. I wish these men to think once before they make another order or allow the order to which I have referred to continue longer in force.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator would not object if they would think twice, would he?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, if they will only think once, I will be very devoutly thankful; and, while not objecting to more, I will not insist upon any greater burden upon them.

Ordinarily there are 60,000,000 acres of wheat in the United States; that is the normal acreage. There are 50,000,000 acres devoted to the production of the smaller grains, rye, barley, oats, and the like. There are 108,000,000 acres of corn. The average production of wheat per acre in the United States is 16.7 bushels. If by the order to which I have referred the production of binders is curtailed one-half, it can readily be seen what that means. If the production is curtailed 25 per cent, Senators know what that means. For the 50,000,000 acres used in the production of small grain other than wheat the effect will be similar. For the 108,000,000 acres of corn inside of the great corn belt of the United States, if the 25 per cent order on sheet steel remains in force, it will reduce by 20,000 the number of new corn planters in the immediate future.

Now, the farmer is a temperamental fellow after all, although there is not on this question very much sentiment in him. As a rule, he never buys farm machinery except under the pressure of necessity. The farm machinery business is a seasonal one. The manufacturers in the center of the industry begin to make corn planters in August out of the material that is assembled. They begin to make binders in October. They begin to send the binders south, where the small grain matures earlier, along in January, and follow the season as it comes north with their shipments. Shipments of corn planters run along in the same way throughout the corn belt, because the season varies somewhat with the latitude. The only way that the supply of these implements can be kept up is for the order to be recinded. In the educational work of the Department of Agriculture, I wish to impress upon the responsible head of that department and upon the responsible committee of the Senate that their first duty is to reach the ear of those in authority or they will stop the productive energies of the grain-producing area of the Northwest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber paying attention when the Senator read the order to which he has referred. Will he kindly read it again? Was it an order from the Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is a circular letter; but apparently it is based on an order or a direction of the Council of National Defense to the United States Steel Co. It is something as follows. I will give the Senator the substance of it, although I am not at liberty to incorporate it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it from the steel company?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; from the United States Steel Co., and it says in substance——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. To whom is it addressed?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is addressed to the managers of the manufactories I have described. I think all of them have received the same circular letter in reference to the 50 per cent limitation on sheet steel; which, as I have said, has been modified to 25 per cent. They have raised the supply allowed to 75 per cent, so that the manufacturers are only short 25 per cent now, instead of 50 per cent. The letter ran about as follows: "In a conference held with the National Council of Defense it was concluded that the supply of sheet steel to the agricultural-implement houses, of which you are one, should be limited to 50 per cent of your normal demand compared with previous years." That is about the substance of the paragraph immediately affecting this question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Have these houses no other source of supply?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator means, than the United States Steel Co.? No; not in any adequate quantity, not enough to affect the market.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How long ago was that circular letter issued?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think, guessing somewhat, that it was issued about three weeks or possibly a month ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Illinois if that letter was not pursuant to the purpose and policy to utilize a very large proportion of the output of the steel manufacturers in the production of ships?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; there is no doubt of that; but it is a question of whether it is better for us first to have ships or food. If we do not have an adequate food supply we may not be able to feed our own people, and we may not be able to have any surplus to transport abroad in the ships when they are built.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator whether it is not likely that the Council of National Defense considered that feature of the problem before suggesting the limitation in the amount of steel that would be allotted to the producers of agricultural implements, and whether it is not advisable to lodge somewhere the power to say how much shall go to one purpose and how much to another?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will assume that the Council of National Defense did consider it. I would rather think that they overlooked it than that they considered it, and then, in the face of that consideration, entered such an order or made such a stipulation with the steel company.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very much surprised that the order should have been applied to the makers of agricultural implements, because it seems to me that the extent to which building operations have been checked would enable the steel manufacturing concerns to supply the normal wants of the agricultural-implement concerns. I should like, however, to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that there is a considerable portion of the products of agricultural-implement houses exported to other lands, and whether, under the present arrangement, the agricultural-implement houses would not be able to supply the home consumption?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. The managers of the concerns say that it will cut short their output designed for use in the United States. I might state, as probably casting some light on the subject, that the export of agricultural implements from this area has been very largely curtailed since about the year 1916, beginning with the season of 1915. We formerly exported very largely to Mexico. We export some to Canada yet. We formerly exported from this area a very large quantity of the finished product to the Russian wheat fields. It was a very desirable trade and kept the factories running full capacity with three shifts of eight hours each the year around. But since the troubled conditions resulting from the war the larger part of this export trade has been cut off. In fact, 20 months ago, at the time of the last report I had, the factories were running at something like 60 per cent of their normal capacity. That was largely, if not entirely, due to the curtailment of exports to the European wheat fields.

They used to send a great many of these implements to France. France is quite a large producing area, and they had a very profitable market. The French farmer bought very liberally of these machines, and they were used especially in the Russian wheat fields. They furnished a very large area, along with many plows and drills that are manufactured especially for use by the Russians. We do not use such implements in this country at all; but having found the kind they needed, they were enabled to manufacture it, and that kept the factory running 12 months of the year.

With this curtailment, however, in the supply of sheet steel, they assure me that it will be impossible to furnish the domestic demands on corn planters or binders, either one. Soon much of the area of the small grains will begin to be harvested. They are harvesting in Texas now; and that area will move north with the season, and as the crops approach the time to ripen the demand for the machines will be coming in. That is what I started to say a bit ago—that the farmer buys what he needs. He does not generally buy in anticipation of future needs. It is a seasonal kind of product. The manufacturers make and store it up. They manufacture it as far as they can and have it in their warehouses in the area where it will be needed for delivery when the crops are to be harvested. But very largely, more so than in any other manufacturing business, I think, in this country, the manufacturer of agricultural implements is obliged to assemble his material and manufacture without booked orders. He must fill his warehouses in anticipation of what the reasonable, normal demand will be in the coming season. To that degree he is a considerable speculator on conditions, and he must take the chances in order to fill adequately the demands that are made on him.

With these conditions, taking Chicago as the central point, within a radius of 200 miles, including Indiana, you will find the factories that make 95 per cent of all the agricultural implements in the world, and it is a most serious problem with which they are confronted. If the present conditions continue, it will go directly to the harvesting of the crop.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. That will result, I assume, in a very largely increased price upon agricultural implements, will it not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I asked the question. The price of agricultural implements has increased somewhat, but if the Senator will take the list prices I think he will find that there is less increase in the price of agricultural implements than any other manufactured article coming out of the factory.

Mr. KENYON. But will not this order tend to increase the price very much?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly it will. I will give an illustration at Omaha, Nebr., that came by letter.

A farmer 60 miles from Omaha wanted what we call a lister, a breaking plow and a corn planter combined. When the winter-wheat ground will not produce any crop, they plow up the wheat. That is what they used to do. Now they use the lister, and they seed the corn without breaking it up again. This farmer had a field that he wanted to utilize in that way. He could not find any of the machines in his neighborhood. He got on a train and went to Omaha, and went to the John Deere Co.'s office, and tried to buy from them one of these machines. They had none. He left, and about two hours afterwards he came back. He said, "You have one machine, a sample, in your warehouse." "Yes, we have; but it is sold and has been sold for a long time. We did not tell you of that because it is not available." The lister sells at $65 retail to the farmer. The farmer pulled $130, two prices, out of his pocket, and offered it to the John Deere Co. for the machine. Of course, they were obliged to refuse it, because it had been sold to another farmer.

This indicates the stress under which the farmer is working. This citizen of Nebraska stated that he did not want to let the ground lie fallow. He wanted to utilize it. He said, "I have read a great deal about crop production. I have lost my wheat, but I want to put in a corn crop. I want to make it productive. I want to add my share to increasing the food supplies of the country; and this is the only available way, in view of the lateness of the season now, that I have to put in a corn crop"; and he could not even do that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. This is rather a serious situation of which the Senator speaks. It seems to be a contest as to where the available steel should go—whether into the construction of ships or into the production of agricultural implements. Can the Senator tell us whether the manufacturers of the implements have been heard before the Council of National Defense, and have presented their needs?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have; and, as I said, they secured a 25 per cent modification of the original 50 per cent order; but they still have on them a 25 per cent restriction, which is a very material impediment in their manufacture.

Mr. WALSH. So that apparently the Council of National Defense has had the subject under very careful consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The manager of one of the large companies was here to-day and appealed to me. I do not go over before the departments any more, and I do not think I shall. Whatever I have to say I am going to say in the Senate. I do not propose, for my part, to go over and spend half a day about any department in the executive branch of this Government again. What I have to say I will say here, and say it for the benefit of the department.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to say by way of excuse for what seems to me a very hurtful and grievous mistake which the Council of National Defense has made in that order that there should be some extenuation in the fact that the world is now engaged in the wholesale business of murder. That is the business now engaging the attention of most of the distinguished men of the civilized Christian world. This is an era of bloodletting and the most glorious is the man who can let the most blood and send the most souls to eternity.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is a sort of blood lust which has taken possession of the hearts of the most civilized people of ancient or modern times, temporarily dethroned their reason, stifled for the time the qualities of love, fraternity, and brotherhood which heretofore has been the pride and glory of our civilization. The world is more concerned just now in providing instruments of destruction of human life than it is in providing implements for the cultivation of the soil and the conservation of our natural resources. Money getting and man murdering is of more importance to-day than surrounding the home with comforts and vouchsafing to the citizens those opportunities which work for happiness and human well-being generally. The able and patriotic Senator from Illinois ought not to be too hard on those modern patriots, for there is some extenuation in the facts that I have related. They are no worse than the balance of us. When I consider the present with all of its horrors and painful abnormalities I can scarcely realize that I am living in the same country and the same century and among the same people of four years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true. I am not saying this in any censorious spirit, but I am saying it because it is worth a good deal more to say it here than it is to go over and talk either to the head of a department or to some subordinate. It goes in one ear and out of the other. That is the most I can say of it. I do not really know that it gets in the first ear.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if there has been any restriction upon the amount of steel used in the construction of large buildings?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not heard of any. I am not informed of any such orders. Although we speak of them as orders, they are not legal orders; they are only trade agreements that are made with the concurrence of the Council of National Defense; and many times the only way I find them out is by somebody affected by an order, who finds his operations hindered, coming into my office or wiring to me.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would suggest to the Senate that it might be well to restrict the amount of steel used in these big buildings, if there be a real shortage of steel, such as the Senator describes. I have no doubt he describes it correctly. If the manufacturers can not get sufficient steel to construct farm implements, and the Government needs steel to build ships, we might in some way cut off the supply of these big buildings that are going up everywhere. There are a number going up in the city of Washington at this moment. Perhaps it would be well to cut off their supply rather than to cut it off on the ships or on the agricultural implements.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the restriction upon the construction of large buildings has been automatic. Whereas steel for the construction of buildings cost only $47 a ton before the outbreak of the war, or about that time, it now costs $130 a ton, and that has automatically practically put a stop to all new building. Some buildings are being constructed which were under contract, but practically speaking there is very little steel now used in construction work.

If a proper showing can be made before the Council of National Defense, I shall be very much surprised if that order is not still further modified so as to permit the use of all necessary steel in the manufacture of agricultural implements. I think probably the Senator will find, if he examines the matter, that those concerns that are engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements are to some extent also engaged in the manufacture of automobiles, and that it has been thought possible that the use of steel by those concerns could be restricted without interfering particularly with agriculture. Is not that the fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; some of the men are interested in both. There is an element of truth in what the Senator says. I do not mean that as qualifying the truth of his statement, but there is such an element of truth from my angle, as I look at it, that I can not answer his question "yes" or "no" and be entirely accurate. I will answer in this way:

The general manager of one of the largest agricultural-implement houses in the country and in this area that I have described, a constituent of mine, is also the vice president of one of the large automobile companies; so he is engaged in both lines of manufacture. I said, "What is the relation of the supply between the automobile manufacturing"—they use a large quantity of sheet steel—"and agricultural implements, especially binders and corn planters?" He said, "There is a very close relation affecting each other." There is no limitation on the quantity of sheet steel to be supplied automobile manufacturers. They have contracted months or a year ahead for delivery this spring just as soon as the roads are good. One automobile company has contracts for 60,000 automobiles to be delivered this year. There is no limitation upon the sheet steel they can get. They have a goodly amount of sheet steel in their warehouse now, enough to make 35,000 of the 60,000 automobiles, and still there is no prohibition upon their purchase of sheet steel. But to continue this statement about the man who is not only an agricultural-implement manufacturer but also vice president of the automobile company, he said that he wanted the curtailment put on the automobile manufacture; that people could get along with their old automobiles, or could continue to use their present methods of transportation and do without an automobile for this year, but that we could not do without agricultural implements; and he had interests on both sides, was equally affected financially, and for himself he went before the Council of National Defense or the proper department, the Secretary of Commerce, to-day—or intends to do so before he leaves town—and ask him to modify this order, and if necessary to put restrictions upon the sheet steel delivered to automobile manufacturers, although it affects him equally in both directions.

I think only a very few, if any, of the agricultural-implement factories make automobiles. Most of them are making agricultural implements only.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Illinois speaks of the action of the Council of National Defense as an order. I should like to know if it is the Senator's view that the Council of National Defense can make a binding order—whether its function is not simply to investigate and then to advise or recommend? Is not that the function of the Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. Do I understand that a recommendation made by the Council of National Defense is to be treated by the interests affected as an order, and is that what the Senator speaks of as the order made by the Council of National Defense?

Mr. SHERMAN. When I speak of the order I speak of it with the limitation that I gave a while ago, that it is not a legal order, but one that is a matter of agreement between it and industrial concerns; it has the practical effect of making a limitation on the product.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think perhaps I can shed a little light on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Under both the Army bill and the Navy bill the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized to commandeer steel and other supplies of that character for national purposes. They go to a steel company and say, "We need so much steel for the purpose of building ships," and of course the company has to supply it. The steel company is then obliged to disappoint those who have contracted with it, in order to supply the Government, because if it does not meet the Government's demands the Government will commandeer the whole thing and even take possession of the plant. So that the Council of National Defense simply says to the steel company, "We need so much steel," and then the steel company says to its customers, "The Government is demanding so much of us that we can not meet your demands, and you will have to cut them down by 25 or 50 per cent," as the case may be.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand, from the discussion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Government or the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy had yet resorted to commandeering. I supposed that in the instance to which he refers the Council of National Defense, not having the power to make a binding order on any one or upon any interest, had simply recommended a certain course, and the interests affected were expected to agree to that recommendation and treat it virtually as an order.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from South Dakota must have misunderstood me if he gathered the idea that I have suggested that they have commandeered at all. They have the power to commandeer; and with the power back of them, as a matter of course, whatever they ask in the way of steel must be supplied by the steel manufacturers. When they say to the steel manufacturers: "We need so much," they are obliged in turn to say to ordinary customers: "We can not supply your needs."

But there is another thing of which I want to speak. The Senator spoke about the roundabout way in which he had secured this information. Now, as I understand, we have an Official Bulletin. It would be very helpful, would it not, to the Members of both legislative bodies, if official action of that kind were published daily in the Bulletin for the information of all of us?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt of it. That is why I was ready to vote for a joint congressional committee on the management of war expenditures. I can not get to a department. I have not time, for one thing. The only way I can do anything is through my secretary. He is much more capable and diplomatic in those affairs than I am. But if there were a joint congressional committee, I could go to the Senators who represented this body, or the House members, and could very conveniently and expeditiously put before them complaints such as I have had to-day. I have had a very great many of them. I have refrained from inflicting them on the Senate not because I have not thought they were of sufficient importance but there is enough to take our time in this Chamber. I have asked those concerned to go and present their grievances from time to time, and obtain as far as possible a removal of these obstacles to normal production. In a large manufacturing and agricultural State like Illinois every order made here vitally affects production. I would occupy the Senate's time continually if I brought them all up. A joint committee such as proposed by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] would serve a most useful purpose.

I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that these are not orders in a legal sense at all. As I explained a bit ago, they are voluntary arrangements made at the time. I think it was three weeks or a month ago that the one was made to which I referred. They are simply observances by these manufacturing companies of the requests of the Government. They take the Council of National Defense as reflecting the wishes of the President. It is a matter of patriotism for these manufacturers, giving them credit for a fair degree of public spirit. When they understand that a governmental department wishes a certain line of action to be followed, they observe it. They are volunteering, and have placed their resources at the disposal of the Government, to be used as the departments here shall order; it is in pursuance of that that they have run up against this 50 per cent limit on the quantity of steel they require. It is far from being an encouraging response to their public-spirited offers.

Here is another thing about which I want to say a few words before I yield the floor: The members of the Council of National Defense do not keep sufficiently in their minds what is impressed upon them by these interests that are up against the manufacturing end of it. That is the difficulty. Here a matter of a month or six weeks ago there was a great furor spread over the country about utilizing waste ground. We were going to plow up the Rocky Mountains and drain all the morasses and swamps, the Everglades of Florida and everything else, raise onions in the parks, plant sweet potatoes and corn on vacant lots, and have enough of those things raised on waste ground to feed two or three nations like ourselves. Well, those are more or less fads, of course; but under the impulse of the temporary excitement the Government made inquiry from these same manufacturing concerns I am talking about as to how many tractor plows they could furnish in a given time. This same Council of National Defense learned from that request that all the tractor plows these companies could manufacture within the time required were contracted long ago to American farmers. They could not promise to deliver a single plow to the Government, because their capacity was contracted up to the minute.

If they had only kept that in mind and seen the other end of the stepladder—to use the simile I used here the other day—if they had followed that out, they would have seen the condition under which these factories were working. They would have seen that the normal output of binders and corn planters would have been affected by such an order as this. What the Council of National Defense need, I think, and the members of the Cabinet—and I am not saying this in a critical sense at all—is a joint congressional committee or some kind of authority—I do not care what you call it—to link the legislative department of the Government with the executive department and the Council of National Defense, so that our constituents who come here from all over the United States, some on one thing and some on another, and present the conditions to us may, through that committee, reach these departments, whether Congress is in session or not.

Here is another circumstance I want to state. It will take just a moment, and then I shall conclude. What will become of the plows? All the related products of iron and steel ultimately will be affected by such a restriction as this. Sixty per cent of all the steel plows made in the world are made in the Moline district. Ninety-five per cent of the entire product of the plow manufacturers is made within a radius of 200 miles of Chicago. The chilled plowshare is used in New England, where there is a superfluity of gravel or gritty substances in the mold that is turned. It is that kind of a chilled iron plow that goes into that country from my district. The steel plowshare is the one used in all the grain-producing country, where there is a soft soil. It is the only plow that will scour, as the farmers say they have found by experience. Now, ultimately these products will be affected in the same way unless the Council of National Defense shall understand the result of their order and modify it in some way so that the restrictions shall not apply.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Illinois to say that he was in accord with the particular clause in this bill which has been cut down from $4,500,000 to $3,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. Now, speaking for myself, I want to say that I do not believe there is any clause in this bill so important to the welfare of this country as this clause, reading:

> For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others.

I do not believe our committee exercised the courage of its convictions when it cut this appropriation down from the House provision of $4,500,000 to $3,000,000. It was simply yielding to what it believed to be a general demand on the part of the Senate that everything in this bill be cut down. I am almost certain, from what I know of the committee and the discussions going on while we have had this measure under consideration here, that had the committee acted on their own judgment fearlessly they would have left the amount as fixed by the House $4,500,000. If the Senator believes that that amount should be left there, I wish he would make the motion that we restore the House provision, and I, for one, shall very gladly support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that the amendment has not yet been adopted.

Mr. PAGE. Well, if that is the situation I wish simply to repeat that in my judgment this is the most important provision in the bill. I sincerely hope the Senate will vote against the committee amendment; and I should be very glad if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], if he speaks for the chairman, would consent to the rejection of the committee amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would not have the authority to do that, and I do not know that the chairman would; but I should not feel at all badly to see the committee amendment rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senator from New York to let us finish the committee amendments. There are only two or three more, and we are very anxious to finish them to-night. Then any individual amendments can be offered.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this is a matter entirely apart from the bill.

Mr. KENYON. There is no much more important matter in this country now than getting a bill in shape where we can have a food survey of the country. Of course I can not help it if the Senator wants to discuss something else, however.

Mr. CALDER. I think the Senator will agree that the matter I have in mind is fully as important as anything that is pending in the bill. I will not take more than 10 minutes of the time of the Senate. This is a matter that I have had in mind for several days, and I came to the conclusion finally that it was my duty to lay it before the Senate.

Yesterday the Senate acted upon a resolution presented by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], referring to the Committee on Naval Affairs a resolution to investigate the loss of the lives of two nurses on a merchant ship on its way to Europe. This was most unfortunate, but, many believed, unpreventable. I have had called to my attention a matter which I believe is preventable. It is of such grave concern that I think it my duty to bring it to the attention of the Senate.

I hold in my hand a round robin sent to me by sailors on the U. S. S. Solace, the Navy hospital ship, that deals with conditions on that ship. I bring it to the attention of the Senate so that the Naval Affairs Committee may take up the matter for investigation.

This round robin reads as follows:

Sanitary conditions on board of U. S. S. Solace May 18 to 21, 1917:
1. When we were sent from our ships lying at different points in the fleet base we were compelled to carry our own baggage, with fevers ranging from 100 to 103 degrees.
2. Drinking water very scarce. I had three glasses while on board (C. K. E.), and some men had only one glass apiece. I might add that there was no ice water and the water was very warm.
3. The dishes used by men sick with measles were washed in lavatory, where vessels were standing around with germs of scarlet fever and mumps, which said germs were thrown in same receptacle used by men with measles; the dishes, forks, and knives were wiped with toilet paper.
4. All food was served to men on one large platter, the motto of which was, "Help yourself or go without."
5. Men who were very sick were compelled to sleep on the deck with blankets (two). Many of these men had high fevers.
6. Blankets used by men with measles, mumps, and scarlet fever were piled up in one stack, and at night they were issued to the first ones who came for them. These blankets were not sterilized, and there were many risks taken by the men of transferring disease to one another.
7. Sick men unable to wash themselves went without for length of trip on U. S. S. Solace to the hospital at Norfolk.
Signed by men who experienced these conditions on U. S. S. Solace.

This round robin is signed by thirty-odd sailors of the fleet. I am going to withhold their names for the present. This is a matter that the Committee on Naval Affairs should thoroughly and completely investigate, and if the facts stated in this paper are true the severest punishment should be meted out to the men responsible. We are asking our young men to enlist in the Navy; we contemplate organizing a great Army, and if in the very beginning a condition of this kind exists the Senate ought to know it, and it ought to be remedied forthwith.

Mr. KENYON. I ask that the next committee amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 4, strike out "three," after the word "section," and insert "one," so as to make the first part of the paragraph read:

For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purpose of section 1 of this act; extending and enlarging the market news service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 6, line 8, to strike out "$3,500,000," and insert "$2,522,000," so as to make the remainder of the paragraph read:

and preventing waste of food in storage, in transit, or held for sale, directing the market movement or distribution of perishable products, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act, $2,522,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 16, to strike out "$2,000,000" and insert "$1,200,000," so as to read:

For miscellaneous items, including the salaries of Assistant Secretaries appointed under this act; special work in crop estimating; aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor; enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions, $1,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 17, before the words "per cent," to strike out "twenty" and insert "five," and after the words "per cent" to strike out the words "of the total," so as to read:

Such part, not exceeding 5 per cent of any of the foregoing sums as the Secretary of Agriculture may find not to be required for carrying out the purposes of the particular item for which specifically appropriated may, by his order, from time to time, be transferred to any other such item or items, or may be otherwise used for carrying out the purposes of this act, including the payment of such rent, the expense of such printing and publications, and the employment of such agencies in the Department of Agriculture, such persons, and such means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 3, to insert:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress at its regular session in December of each year a detailed report of the expenditure of all moneys herein appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change the numbering of section 10 to section 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 7, line 13, before the word "year," to strike out the word "one" and insert "the beginning of the next fiscal," so as to read:

SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the committee that I think it is unwise to make the amendment the committee recommends here. If the war should close a month before the 30th of June, the department might have their plans arranged, and yet they could not carry them out. It seems to me they ought to know as nearly as possible about how much time they will have to do the work we have appropriated for here. If they know they have a year after the conclusion of the war, they can make their plans accordingly. I suppose the committee considered that, but it seems to me this provision is rather unwise, because, as I said, if the war closes 30 days before the end of the fiscal year the work can not go on in the next fiscal year.

Mr. KENYON. I think there is a good deal of force in the suggestion of the Senator. The House provision—I am not certain, but my recollection is—provided for the year 1918. I ask the Senator if he will let the amendment be adopted, and the matter will be taken up and considered later, and perhaps a different section can be drawn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. I would rather see the committee amendment voted down, but I shall not insist upon it. I think it can be worked out probably in conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would not want to have the amendment agreed to without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 29, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the Life and Light of men, our God and our Father, the Inspiration of every generous impulse, high resolve, and noble endeavor, we thank Thee for the sublime height reached and kept by our fathers through their dauntless courage, heroic sacrifices, and splendid achievement in a Government whose foundations were laid in the inherent rights of man—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, which through all the vicissitudes of the past has come down to us, increased a thousandfold in all that makes a nation great. Help us, we beseech Thee, to realize how great is the responsibility resting upon us; that every citizen throughout the length and breadth of our Republic may renew his allegiance and pledge his patriotism to its preservation. We thank Thee that a day has been set apart to memorialize the patriots in all the history of our past that we may cherish their memories and holy sacrifices in the preservation of our sacred heritage, and to inspire the living to emulate their deeds in this hour when patriotism is filling a large place in our country's needs. May the day indeed inspire our hearts and deepen our love for right and truth, justice, and liberty. In the spirit of Him who taught us faith, hope, and love. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ESPIONAGE AND NEUTRALITY.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill H. R. 291, commonly known as the espionage and neutrality bill, and also to file with it the statement of the managers on the part of the House, both to be printed under the rule for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution passed by the Commercial Club of Lewiston, Idaho, and another resolution passed by the board of county commissioners of Lincoln County, Idaho, at Shoshone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the explosives bill (H. R. 3932).

Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole I would like to see if we can agree on time for general debate on this bill. There is no other business from the Committee on Mines and Mining, and I suggest that we have an hour of general debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] does not happen to be here at this moment.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] is for the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] is here, and he is also for the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand he does not object to the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether there is any demand for general debate except on the part of some members of the committee who desire to explain the bill briefly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They desire only to speak on the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Only on the bill. I ask unanimous consent for one hour of general debate on the bill.

Mr. STRONG. That will be plenty of time, I think.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour, and that the debate be on the bill.

Mr. CANNON. One-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and one-half by those who oppose the bill, if there are any.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. One half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and the other half by those who oppose the bill, if there are any.

Mr. FOSTER. And by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG], if there is no one opposed to the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I have not read the bill, and I do not know that I want to say a word, but if there is anyone opposed to it, opportunity should be given.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, we will be glad to accommodate the gentleman. There is no disposition to shut off anybody.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. FOSTER was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes, with Mr. HOUSTON in the chair.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I object. The bill is very short. I think it should be read.

Mr. FOSTER. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] objects. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and ingredients thereof, unless such manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession is in compliance with the provisions of, for the purposes set out in, and in the manner provided by the regulations authorized by the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That upon the passage of this act the President of the United States is authorized, empowered, and directed to prepare, make, and promulgate by public proclamation such rules and regulations in the interest of public safety as he may deem necessary governing the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, or possession for necessary and proper purposes in time of war, all such smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and the ingredients thereof: Provided, The President may by proclamation from time to time make such alterations, modifications, and amendments to such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and which the public safety may permit or require.

SEC. 3. That in order to carry out the provisions of this act and the directions contained therein, the Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to employ such persons, without regard to civil-service requirements, and to utilize such agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof, and the District of Columbia, in the execution of this act, and all agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act when acting by the direction of the Bureau of Mines.

SEC. 4. That for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and including supplies, equipment, expenses of traveling and subsistence, and the purchase and hire of horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

SEC. 5. That any person or corporation who violates the provisions of this act, or any of the rules and regulations made, established, and promulgated under the provisions of this act, shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than three years, or both.

SEC. 6. That section 1 of this act shall take effect 30 days after the proclamation of the President promulgating such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this bill now before the committee is intended to regulate the manufacture, sale, storage, and use of explosives under regulations to be promulgated hereafter by the President in case this bill shall become a law.

This matter came up first on a suggestion in the War Department. It was then taken up with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, and at a conference of the manufacturers and users of explosives throughout the United States it was determined that some law of this kind ought to be placed upon the statute books during the continuance of the war, so that there might not be that indiscriminate use and sale of explosives which might cause loss of life and destruction of property throughout the United States. This bill is the result of conferences with these departments and of hearings held before the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Up to the present time, so far as we know, there have been no great explosions caused by the illegal use of explosives, but we do not know when such trouble may come and what destruction may take place. This bill is not intended to hamper in any way the legitimate use of explosives. We all realize that farmers in their work must use dynamite for blowing out stumps, cleaning ditches and work of that character, and that miners must necessarily use explosives in their daily work. So this bill will not hamper the legitimate use of these explosives that these classes of our people must have. It is only intended to reach a small fraction of 1 per cent of people throughout the United States, who may engage in the nefarious work of stealing explosives or making explosives in an illegitimate way to use them for the destruction of property, thereby interfering very much with the war. The bill in order to comply with the provisions of the Constitution has been taken up with the members of the Committee on Mines and Mining who are members of the legal profession, and I shall leave to them the explanation of that particular feature of this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it thought that the regulations such as are contemplated under the provisions of this bill may prevent such explosions as occurred in New Jersey a year or so ago, opposite New York City, in which so much Government property was destroyed on Ellis Island and Governors Island?

Mr. FOSTER. That was by the illegitimate use of explosives?

Mr. TOWNER. I ask if it is expected that the regulations contemplated under this act will prevent explosions in the future.

Mr. FOSTER. I can not answer the gentleman for I do not call to mind what caused that explosion.

Mr. TOWNER. That was caused by the misuse of explosives or the careless use of explosives. I think it was loading them practically near an open fire.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; the issuance of these regulations would tend to prevent that.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I think that explosion took place not because of the use of explosives but because of the defective methods of handling. They were being placed aboard of a boat for transportation. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Section 3 provides for the employment of persons taking charge of this work. About how many people does the gentleman think will be employed?

Mr. FOSTER. Not a great many.

Mr. HICKS. A thousand?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; probably not more than 50 or 100.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The title of the act provides that it is to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, and section 1 seeks to deal with that provision. Section 2 authorizes and empowers the President to prepare such rules and regulations in regard to the manufacture, storage, and possession of explosives. This, I take it, is not intended in any way to curtail the manufacture of explosives that is so necessary in all mining.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; the regulations will not interfere in the least with the legitimate use of these explosives in the mines or on the farm.

Mr. RAKER. Nor the manufacture of them.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. RAKER. The idea is to observe the places where they are manufactured, to whom sold, and who has them, so that we may keep an inventory of what the explosives are, how much there is, and in whose possession they are.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly what the bill is intended to do.

Mr. RAKER. And the fullest latitude that now exists will be accorded to the manufacturers to manufacture them, particularly for all mining industries.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I come from a mining district, and that the State of Illinois has 80,000 miners, and it is a union State. I have conferred with these miners, and there is no objection whatever as far as I have been able to find out.

Mr. RAKER. So far as the entire mining operations are concerned, there would be practically nothing except the rules and regulations as to their reception of it and a sort of inventory of the amount they got, which practically would not be a burden on them to comply with the rules and regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not; and there is no intention to cast any burden upon them. It may result in their being a little more careful. But I want to say this: It came to my notice that in one zinc mine in the United States they found a miner carrying dynamite out in his dinner bucket, and upon a search of his room they found a valise full of dynamite. It is intended to prevent such occurrences wherever they may be.

Mr. RAKER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Of course, this particular subject would be peculiarly within the province of the several States as to the handling of explosives?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but it is intended to cooperate with the local agencies everywhere throughout the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman remember now as to what States have laws for the proper regulations of explosives?

Mr. FOSTER. New York has a good statute, and New York City has the best regulations of any city in the United States. They have to have them, because they use a million pounds of dynamite in New York City in excavations. Since the great explosion at Los Angeles, the State of California has passed a most excellent law, I think the best State law in the United States on the question of explosives. They require there that men who buy dynamite, if they comply with the law——

Mr. RAKER. They always comply with the law, except somebody comes in from some other place.

Mr. FOSTER. They require that no man can buy dynamite for any purpose whatever unless he is known and vouched for by some one acquainted with him.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I notice in section 4 it provides an appropriation for expenses of traveling and subsistence and the purchase and hire of horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles. I would like to ask if the purpose of that provision is to purchase vehicles for the purpose of hauling dynamite, or hauling the people who are to be employed under section 3?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, the gentleman knows, I am sure, it is not intended to employ them in hauling dynamite. My colleague is facetious about that, I take it. The intention is that it may be necessary to secure a motor-propelled vehicle of some kind, or it might be necessary to hire it in the discharge of their duty.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. JUUL. Section 6 provides:

That section 1 of this act shall take effect 30 days after the proclamation of the President promulgating such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary.

What is the meaning of that?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that when this bill becomes a law, if it shall, then there ought to be a reasonable time between the promulgation of the regulations and the going into effect, so that people might know the provisions. Three hundred newspapers of the United States have volunteered to give space in their newspapers to the notice of these regulations, so that everybody may know them.

Mr. JUUL. I wanted to ask the gentleman why this period for publication is limited to section 1 of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The publication is after the regulations, in case this should become a law.

Mr. JUUL. When does the act take effect?

Mr. FOSTER. Thirty days after these regulations shall have been issued.

Mr. JUUL. You say section 1 of this act shall take effect 30 days after the regulations have been issued. When do the other sections take effect?

Mr. FOSTER. They all take effect at the same time. At least, it was so intended.

Mr. JUUL. Would it not be wise to say that the act should then take effect?

Mr. FOSTER. Section 1 is the inhibition, the gentleman will notice.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to line 5, on page 1. I observe that the ingredients of smokeless powder are included among those things which it shall be unlawful to store. If we adopt this, we say that it shall be unlawful to manufacture ether or nitric acid; it shall be unlawful to store or use cotton. Cotton is the principal ingredient of smokeless powder.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that he has raised a question which, I think, ought to be explained. We talked that over, and it was talked of in the hearings. There are many ingredients, many common ingredients, some of them too common, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] suggests, that are ingredients of the most deadly explosives. We could not prohibit the handling of all of it, it is true, but there are certain essential ingredients that go into explosives. This can not regulate all of it, but it is intended to reduce it to the very minimum. The gentleman is right in calling attention to it, because that is an important thing, and if you would stop the possession of all these ingredients you would interfere with the daily life of the people, with the necessities of life, and you could not do that. There has to be some common sense used in the regulations, and I have no doubt it will be done.

Mr. GOOD. What I wanted to ask the gentleman was whether or not it would weaken the bill in any respect if the bill could be enacted into law if those words were stricken out?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I think it would, because there are certain ingredients which could not be controlled and sold under certain regulations, and if you strike that out, you strike out many of these that can be regulated in that way.

Mr. GOOD. I am unable to understand how you will practically operate it. Take cotton, for instance. If you enact this into law it shall be unlawful, then, to store or use cotton in time of war.

Mr. HAMLIN. Excepting under the regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be taken care of in the regulations.

Mr. HAMLIN. The department will take care of that.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman may be right, but——

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; under the regulations. The bill starts out making it unlawful to do certain things, but another provision says "except under the regulations."

Mr. GOOD. Of course, then it would be within the power of the President to prohibit the storage of alcohol, because it is one of the ingredients of smokeless powder.

Mr. FOSTER. The President is not going to do any such a foolish thing as that.

Mr. GOOD. But you give him the power to do it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; trusting him to be fair and do right.

Mr. TOWNER. If in themselves they are explosives, then it would not be necessary to refer to them as ingredients of explosives.

Mr. FOSTER. There are certain ingredients very necessary to the making of certain explosives, and those can be to some extent regulated.

Mr. WINGO. They are largely used for that purpose only.

Mr. FOSTER. There are some used for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNER. That are not in themselves explosives?

Mr. FOSTER. Not in themselves explosives.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. As the language now stands in the bill, it would be a crime to have in possession or use any of these ingredients unless the regulations issued by the President covered every possible ingredient of an explosive. I do not wish to anticipate future action, but I want to ask the gentleman whether I am right in understanding that the committee will offer an amendment to this first section adding the words "not detrimental to the public safety."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; we have an amendment that we have written, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and others have considered that, and we propose to submit that to the committee for its consideration.

Mr. LENROOT. If that is adopted, that will remove all of these questions that are raised, because the ingredients by themselves could not possibly endanger the public safety.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSTER. Just one moment. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3932, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I desire to make a very brief statement before submitting a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. On Saturday, while considering the food-survey bill, I offered an amendment providing that the men employed under the bill should not be exempt from military service. That amendment was unanimously agreed to by the members of the committee. On yesterday the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] offered an amendment striking out the language on the last page of the bill preceding my amendment. And the enrolling clerk tells me that in striking out the language it carried out my amendment with it. Inasmuch as everyone was in favor of that amendment, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will keep the amendment in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 92.

Resolved, That in the engrossment of the bill (H. R. 4188) entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products" the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to insert as a new paragraph on page 6, after line 24, the following:

"Provided, That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3932.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3932, with Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3932, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will be kind enough to yield.

Mr. FOSTER. May I inquire how much time I have remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the Chair notify me when 4 minutes have been used.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This bill contemplates a very drastic method of handling explosives. Now, I want to direct the gentleman's attention to just two things. Carloads of explosives are used in the iron mines, for instance, of my own county every few days; also a large quantity of dynamite is used by farmers in clearing land.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. To turn the regulation and control of all these explosives that are so essential to these industries over to rules and regulations to be made by the President and to be enforced by a large number of agents to be appointed leads me to make the inquiry of the gentleman what the necessity for this is?

Mr. FOSTER. The necessity is to endeavor to prevent the illegal possession and use of explosives in time of war. And I would say to the gentleman there is not the slightest danger in the world in his community. I have a mining community, as has the gentleman from Minnesota, and I have talked with these miners, and they have not expressed the slightest objection. They approve of this bill. They say that it is not only a protection to the public but it is a protection to them, and it may prevent some man in the mines with a sort of nefarious iden from wanting to destroy the mines. Throughout the United States in some of the great mines, and I know it to be true in my State, and probably in the gentleman's own State it is true, that these men who are operating these mines are somewhat uneasy as to what may occur to them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman's statement is absolutely correct. I am not criticizing the purpose of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. And nobody will be troubled, but people will be expected to take the necessary precautions at a time like this. That is all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I ask another question? This really affects mines in my district that are furnishing over 70 per cent of the iron ore in my State, and this comes as a surprise. May I ask the gentleman if the gentlemen who are operating coal mines and iron mines have had an opportunity to express their views to the committee?

Mr. FOSTER. They have; all we could get before us.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Were any of the Lake Superior men before the committee?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that there were. I want to say this further to the gentleman, that the statement was made to the committee that before any regulations were to be put into operation the Committee on Mines and Mining should have an opportunity to see what those regulations were and to know what they were. There are on the Committee on Mines and Mining men who come from metal-mining States and were interested as the gentleman from Minnesota is. And I think he has a right to be interested. There are coal-mining districts of the United States represented, and they are to know something of what those regulations are to be.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. As I understand from the gentleman, then, the regulations before being promulgated are to be submitted to the committee for approval?

Mr. FOSTER. They are at least to know something about them. The question was definitely asked if that would be done, and the committee was answered that it would be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The four minutes have expired.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I would like if the gentleman's time could be extended one minute, so that I can ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the time.

Mr. BORLAND. The purpose of this bill is to prevent explosives from getting into the hands of undesirable persons. Now, the mere possession, as this bill says, of ingredients for explosives, not coupled with the intent of manufacturing explosives, would not be a violation of the regulation?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. BORLAND. In other words, the gentleman is convinced that the regulations will be so drawn that there must be coupled with the possession of ingredients the facilities for the manufacture of the explosive?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. It would apply to a man having in his possession a quantity of ingredients without having any legitimate use for them. That would be the kind of a case it would apply to.

Mr. BORLAND. If he had the power of assembling them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It is well known that cotton is one of the ingredients of smokeless powder. Would the gentleman object to incorporating into the bill a proviso to the effect that nothing in this bill shall apply to cotton?

Mr. FOSTER. No. I do not want to commence loading the bill down with that kind of amendments. There is no reason on earth for thinking that anyone in the United States would make the regulations so as to prohibit the buying and storing of cotton. I would rather not go into that. If I thought there was such a thing I would not be for this bill for a minute. But I am confident there is nothing in that.

I will say to my friend this: That if this bill passes and becomes a law and there are any regulations that prohibit the legitimate buying and storing of cotton I will be the first man to come in here and ask that the law be repealed.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Well, I am quite sure of that; but the trouble is this: That when the country has once lost its power over these matters, as has been the case heretofore, we have never been able to regain it, not since I have been here.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not a particle of danger as to that, any more than in the case of sugar or other ingredients that I might name.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is a matter of the most vital importance. I would like to have some information about it.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] will have 30 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why not have the time extended?

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the time be extended 30 minutes, 15 minutes to be controlled by the other side.

Mr. STRONG. I will give the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But I want to ask some questions of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended—one-half to be controlled by the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has already been fixed.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that you can grant unlimited time under the first section during the five-minute debate.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] is recognized.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, one of the important purposes of the bill which I did not hear discussed—and I do not know whether the chairman of the committee brought it out or not, there being so much confusion—is the making of regulations; and under the regulations which will be promulgated if this bill becomes a law will be one the purpose of which will be to make people more careful, if possible, of the manner in which they keep explosives in their possession. Take it in my district, for instance, and I presume it is the same wherever there are mining industries. There are magazines located out in the woods and in secluded corners, without very much protection, and very roughly constructed, easily broken into, where explosives may be stolen; and one of the objects brought out in the committee hearings was to try to regulate that matter, so far as it could be regulated.

It was agreed before the committee, when Mr. Manning, the Chief of the Bureau of Mines and Mining, was before us, that they would have hearings before the regulations were framed, and those engaged in industries using explosives would be notified. I know in my case I gave Mr. Manning the names of several of the leading bituminous coal operators in Pennsylvania and requested that they be notified, in order that they might appear before the bureau and discuss the regulations before they were submitted to the President for his signature.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the committee consider getting these regulations and proposed regulations and incorporating them into the law so that the country would know and the people affected would know just what the Congress was doing and what law the people would be expected to obey?

Mr. STRONG. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the committee considered that at length and discussed it at length with the representatives of the bureau, and it was concluded that the regulations would probably have to be modified from time to time to meet changing conditions or as new conditions would arise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the committee think it was wise to give any power to anybody to change or modify laws and regulations affecting the welfare of the people and their activities at will? This Government is not yet an imperial power, although we are fast contributing every vestige of right that has been reserved to the people or their representatives. Yet there should be some things held by the representatives of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I want to invite the gentleman's attention to section 2, and in line with the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] criticizing this section because of the authority it gives to the President. I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he considers that the Congress of the United States has the authority under the Constitution to enact section 2 into law?

Mr. STRONG. It has.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman would admit that it could not be done in time of peace, and there is nothing connected with this section that refers to interstate commerce. It is entirely within the State; a matter that is entirely within the borders of a State; and it is intended to give authority to the President to govern the Nation. Is that the idea of the gentleman and of the committee?

Mr. STRONG. The committee could not figure out any way by which we might frame a bill and put in regulations such as were necessary unless we should pass a law of this kind to clothe the President with authority to promulgate rules and regulations from time to time during the war as necessity for the same arose.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Did this bill have the unanimous approval of the committee?

Mr. STRONG. Yes; it had the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is acquainted with the bill that we had up here lately called the espionage bill. It was provided in that bill that the President should be given authority with reference to what should be published in the newspapers, having in mind the danger of certain information being used by the enemy to our detriment. Can the gentleman define the difference, if any, between that provision of the espionage bill and this provision with reference to private property of a different character and nature?

Mr. STRONG. I do not think that would apply.

Mr. DYER. I should like to have the gentleman answer my question if he can.

Mr. STRONG. I do not think I can answer that question.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. With the committee amendment to be offered to this bill there is a very radical change in this section, which makes it unlawful to have these explosives in use in any way that would be detrimental to the public safety, which brings it clearly within the line that was followed in the espionage bill, and thereafter merely left to the President the power to make rules and regulations to define that which is in the interest of public safety.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin state what will be the difference between the espionage bill and this provision as amended?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the gentleman mean from a legal standpoint?

Mr. DYER. From the standpoint of public policy and the interest of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. From the legal standpoint, they would be exactly on the same basis. From the standpoint of public policy the gentleman can form his conclusion as well as I can.

Mr. DYER. I hoped the gentleman would give his view.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG. Not now. I do not want to take any more time in adding to what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has said, but I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who wants to speak against the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is another of the bills giving extreme power to the President and taking out of the hands of Congress the further supervision of the matters referred to in the bill. It also does away with the civil service in the matter of the appointment of such employees as may be needed, up to the amount of $250,000, which is herein appropriated.

Now, we are creating many new positions under the guise of war emergency, and this bill purports to be a war measure. The first paragraph sets out that it is——

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield there just a moment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. I was at a loss to know whether this bill was a war measure or not, because in the second section it says that the President shall promulgate rules and regulations in the interest of public safety. That would make it a police regulation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would seem to be a police regulation, from my point of view.

Mr. STEELE. Now, the difference between this bill and the espionage bill, it seems to me, is this: The espionage bill related to regulations for the Army and Navy exclusively. This bill relates to private property within the borders of the States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly.

Mr. STEELE. Where is the constitutional power in Congress to interfere with private property within the borders of a State, either as a police regulation or as a war measure?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will take the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] by way of illustration. He stated that certain manufacturers or persons in interest had appeared before the committee and indicated that this bill might prevent theft, and things of that kind. That is to say, somebody might surreptitiously get hold of some powder and then use it in an improper way, and this bill would tend to prevent it. If that is true, then the Government is going to spend $250,000 for the employment of police officers for the benefit of the owners of munition plants and others. That is about what it looks like.

Mr. WHEELER. Then under the provisions of this act the President could say to a coal operator, "We want your powder houses guarded, and you must employ those whom we name to guard your powder houses. If not, you can not operate your mines." Is not that true?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There may be something in that. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is one of the most loosely drawn bills I have ever seen. I say that with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], who brings it in.

Mr. WHEELER. Again, they could say to a reputable hardware dealer, who handles explosives, "We do not want you to handle explosives any longer," and that might be quite an important part of his business, and that would exclude him. He might be a reputable citizen and a reliable man in every way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That all depends on the President's interpretation of this law, if it is passed, because there is nothing in the law that informs the citizen, whether a coal operator or a farmer, who desires to use powder for blasting the roots of trees—there is nothing in this bill to inform him as to his rights. He must wait until the President issues his proclamation, and after that proclamation is issued the President may issue other proclamations, alterations, modifications, and amendments thereof.

Mr. WHEELER. Or the department may say, "You must employ certain men to guard your powder houses. If not, the property will be closed."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. The bill appropriates $250,000 for the purpose of employing men who may be engaged without regard to the civil service.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Section 1 lays down the rule of law. Section 2 provides that the President may make regulations to carry it out and section 5 provides the punishment for violating the rule of law and the regulations. But if you turn to section 3——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will wait just a minute, I will call attention to the fact that section 5 provides for a fine of not more than $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than three years, or both. It does not say "or." The man who violates this law is caught with both fine and imprisonment. That is unusual.

Mr. LITTLE. My question is this: Section 1 provides the rule of law, and section 2 provides for the regulations, and section 5 provides the punishment for a violation of both. Now, turn to section 3, and it seems to provide for the full enforcement of the rule of law, but not for anybody to carry out the regulations. It says that they shall have full authority for "all acts done by them in the execution of this act," but it does not say in execution of these regulations. Can the gentleman give the reason for that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not. Section 3, it seems to me, ought to be rewritten.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I was going to suggest that the regulations have all the effect of law when regulations of that character are authorized by statute.

Mr. LITTLE. That does not answer it, because section 5 provides for the punishment for violating both the law and the regulations, while under section 3 means to arrest are provided for one only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield for further interruption. I suggest that there is absolutely nothing in the bill that informs the citizen as to his rights in the premises. Everything is dependent upon the proclamation of the Executive, as it applies to the use of explosives in every possible manner. A man may be using explosives, as I said a little while ago, to blow up stumps on his farm, but he does not know what his rights are and there is nothing in the law to inform him. Congress is abdicating in this instance, as it has been abdicating in others, the power which under the Constitution it ought to retain.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Can the gentleman conceive of any law that might be authorized that will anticipate the remarkable degree of complication and differentiating circumstances under which explosives might be kept or used, so that the law would take care of every man that had explosives and say how he could be permitted to use them?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The State laws take care of that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; but are they coordinating with the Federal policy in a time of war?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman want us to confer on the Executive the entire control of the storage, care, use, manufacture of all explosives for private purposes as well as for war purposes?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I could outline some policy as to the use and care of explosives in time of war as incidental to the national defense so that there should be some coordination with reference to the husbanding of it and as to how it should be used and kept.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to having that stated in the law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the law should state the policy, but I think instead of trusting it to the widely different laws of the States——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have heard a great deal about the outrages committed, the blowing up of bridges by the illegitimate use of powder and dynamite, and yet the committee reports that no outrages have yet been caused by explosives that have been traced to such illegitimate use, and we are fortunate that no one has done so. The committee reports that nothing has happened, but that something may happen. There have been no outrages yet, according to the committee. Now, I call the committee's attention to section 3 and ask whether it had not better be rewritten or stricken out altogether. It provides:

SEC. 3. That in order to carry out the provisions of this act and the directions contained therein, the Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to employ such persons, without regard to civil-service requirements, and to utilize such agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and to the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof, and the District of Columbia—

At that point, it seems to me, it might be well to insert "for such purposes as they may be used," but that is not stated; it goes on—in the execution of this act, and all agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act when acting by the direction of the Bureau of Mines.

That is certainly a mixture of authority. The President apparently is eliminated from this particular section, and the State authorities, if that is what this section means, and the municipal authorities, and such agencies as are named in the bill, are to come under the direction of the Bureau of Mines. So after all we are not in reality conferring the power on the President—this wide supervision of public and private rights, this general oversight of all ingredients and materials entering into the manufacture of powder, but we are turning it over to the Bureau of Mines in a time of war. If we are to care for the public safety, possibly the Attorney General should be called in.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think, under existing law, that there is power conferred to use $250,000 for the purchase of any kind of motor passenger-drawn vehicle for use anywhere in the United States, including the District of Columbia, at the will of the purchasing officer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this bill came up in any other way than as a war measure, it is possible that paragraph would not be in the bill, because $250,000 is a large sum of money, and this Congress has not been in the habit of appropriating it to the Bureau of Mines or any other bureau for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles. That provision comes in here under the guise of a war measure. The same thing is being done in several bills that are being presented to the House just now.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman think it is necessary, as in the case of Gen. Squires, of the War Department, that under the guise of taking care of aviation he goes out and buys three Super Six Hudsons in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know about that, but I can refer the gentleman to the testimony of Mr. McSparren, of the National Grange, read into the RECORD yesterday, which suggested that in war times a good many things "are slipped over the farmer," for instance, in matters of appropriation intended for his benefit.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois 5 minutes.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to yield such time as any gentleman wishes who wants to speak against the bill. I want to add that I am not here to answer questions in a defensive way of this bill. I joined in the report, but personally I made a special request that the million of mining people from my district might be heard in regard to these proposed regulations. So you will understand my attitude toward them. I will be glad to yield time to any gentleman who wants to oppose the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He is a member of the committee, and I know that he wants to advise the House. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Did the committee or the gentleman go into the merits of the bill to determine whether or not if this becomes a law and the President promulgates rules and regulations that all of the State statutes would be subordinated to those rules and regulations and abrogated so far as they conflict with the Federal statutes and the rules and regulations?

Mr. STRONG. Yes; that was discussed briefly at one of the meetings which I attended.

Mr. RAKER. What was the determination of the committee upon that?

Mr. STRONG. I do not know that they came to any conclusion. I do not recall. The chairman perhaps could answer the question better than I.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman come to any conclusion upon that himself?

Mr. STRONG. No doubt the State laws would be subordinated.

Mr. RAKER. Would the gentleman think that the laws of a State, which cover all of these questions as to the storage, transportation, sale, and handling, should be abrogated by rules and regulations?

Mr. STRONG. No; I do not think so. I think the laws in our State are sufficient as they are.

Mr. FOSTER. Was it not stated that it was the intention if this should become a law to use all of the local agencies and the State mine examiners and all those people?

Mr. STRONG. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is a need for legislation of this character in connection with the war that our country is now engaged in, and with the committee amendments that I understand will be proposed to sections 1 and 2, I should support the bill so far as that is concerned; but so far as sections 3 and 4 are concerned, authorizing the employment of a large number of employees, the purchase of automobiles, and so forth, I can not for the life of me see what place or purpose that can have in this bill as a war measure. What is the public necessity for this bill? It is to protect public safety by providing a Federal statute, the violation of which will enable the Department of Justice to inaugurate a prosecution under the Federal law.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Just in line with what the gentleman has said, can the gentleman see any necessity for procuring any more employees to find out where explosives are that are now being used in the same method by the Department of Justice?

Mr. LENROOT. No; and if employees are to be used in connection with this matter they should be employees of the Department of Justice and not of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. RAKER. Just one other question. The Department of Justice now having a large force in the field doing all this kind of work, does not the gentleman believe they could just add this right onto that?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and that is why I am in favor of striking out sections 3 and 4 of the bill.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think that it is an oversight that they did not provide in the section for passenger-carrying launches and yachts also?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not want to get away from my view that there is something in this bill that is necessary at this time in the public interest in this time of war, but it should be confined to that thing. For instance, here is a State that has no laws with reference to the regulation or use of explosives. We all recognize the fact that conditions to some extent exist in this country where explosives may be used by enemies of the country, and there ought to be some method of reaching those cases under Federal prosecution, where the mere possession of an explosive under certain circumstances should be a crime, and for that reason I think that sections 1 and 2 as amended, and the penalty, should become a law; but so far as the large number of additional employees is concerned, it can not be justified, and there is no purpose in it so far as this war is concerned. If there be a purpose, it is wholly apart and outside of the war situation.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. If the Bureau of Mines is charged with the responsibility of the enforcement of this act, upon what theory does the gentleman believe the employees ought to be under the control of the Department of Justice?

Mr. LENROOT. The Bureau of Mines ought not to be charged with the enforcement of this act any more than the Bureau of Mines should be charged with the enforcement of any other law relating to any unlawful act made a crime by the statutes of the United States. That should rest wholly with the Department of Justice.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Section 3, that the gentleman proposes to strike out, is the only place that carries authority for the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all; so that if we strike out sections 3 and 4 it will remain a penal statute, where Federal prosecution may be inaugurated by the Department of Justice for the violation of a Federal law, and that is as far as I think the statute ought to go.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if the Committee on Mines and Mining would have any jurisdiction over the matter with the elimination of these things?

Mr. LENROOT. Then, I think, it should properly belong to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, a question has been raised where State laws having to do with explosives may come in conflict with the laws of the United States, and I should like to have the gentleman state whether in every such case the State laws would be set aside.

Mr. LENROOT. I would state that if a State law permitted the use or possession of explosives in a certain way and the President, under the power conferred by this bill, should conclude and by regulations order that that kind of possession was detrimental to the public safety, the State law to that extent would be set aside.

Mr. STRONG. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this statute is a punitive one. It makes a law and it provides there may be regulations which the President can issue to enforce the law. In section 5 it provides punishment for violation of "the rules and regulations." In section 3 it provides for the people who shall be authorized to enforce the statute, particularly the State officers and municipal officers, and it says that these people "are given full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act." But it does not say they are given full authority to enforce "the regulations." It has been suggested by my learned friend from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] that the regulations would go with the law as part of it. The fact is just the opposite. The penal statutes are to be strictly interpreted, and if a man were arrested by a State officer for the violation of "the President's regulations," and the fellow should claim he was arrested in pursuance of this section 3, if I were his attorney or the gentleman from Vermont were his attorney, we would say the officer had no authority to arrest. You have no authority to enforce the regulations, and under a punitive statute, if strictly interpreted, the man would get off. If you want to enforce "the President's regulations," you should insert, after "act," the words "and the regulations made thereunder."

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is familiar with the statute regulating the flight of migratory birds of this country and if that is not a penal statute and has been enforced?

Mr. LITTLE. I regret to say that I am not familiar with that statute. I never went hunting in my life. I have several letters from my constituents in regard to that, and I will have to look it up.

Everybody who has tried a criminal case knows that this statement of the use of a criminal statute is the law. You can not send a man to jail unless he is absolutely within the limits of that statute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not a lawyer——

Mr. LITTLE. I beg pardon. I did not intend to slander the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You can not slander me.

Mr. LITTLE. That accounts for your answer to my suggestion—the fact that you are not a lawyer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That may be, and it perhaps may be accounted for in another way, namely, that in many other statutes here the act of Congress expressly authorizes some executive officer to promulgate regulations for the purpose of carrying the act into effect, and I have always been informed here that that authority made those regulations so promulgated a part of the act, to all intents and purposes, and that courts took notice of them as such.

Mr. LITTLE. Those were civil statutes, I presume.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That may be the explanation of it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman seriously contend that if Congress passes a law authorizing an executive officer to make regulations under the law and prohibiting violations of the rules and regulations with a penalty attached, a man can not be convicted of a crime for violating the regulations?

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman heard what I said. They could try the man all right, unless he hired a lawyer. But an arrest, by men named under section 3, for defying the President's "regulations" would be void.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Providing it is the authorization of the statute—that is, the rules and regulations, where a man was authorized to make them.

Mr. LITTLE. If a man should be arrested by some one specially empowered by this section 3, they would have to let him go. There is no authority under section 3 to enforce the regulations.

I think this section 4 should be knocked out. I do not think they should spend $250,000 here. There are enough peace officers now to enforce it. You have all the power of the United States marshal's office. You have appointed the State and municipal people your agents to enforce this statute. Why spend a quarter of a million dollars "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere" for special officers and automobiles and "general expenses"? Who is to expend $250,000? How many autos will it buy for "the District of Columbia and elsewhere"? Why was the "elsewhere" inserted? Evidently an afterthought. This Government probably has more automobiles in this city right now than in all its "elsewhere."

We appropriated $14,000,000 yesterday and nobody here or in the department could tell just what it was all for. Gentlemen, when bread is 15 cents a loaf, $250,000 is a lot of money. We should be husbanding the resources of this Republic; not filling every hand that is thrust at us. Before long this money will be needed for the boys at the front. This money will be furnished by people who are moving heaven and earth to provide their families with food and clothes. I am opposed to spending any of it for the purposes named in section 4, when this country has plenty of peace officers. Tell your troubles to the police. There is too much money used for red tape and incidentals already. Why should the Bureau of Mines have a lot of automobiles?

These continual grants of exceptional authority to clerks all over Washington, under guise of giving power to the President, are of very doubtful propriety, anyway. This Congress is here by authority of the Constitution. This is the day of a great emergency, and I think it time this House meet the responsibilities the Constitution lays on the House. It is becoming evident you will eventually be compelled to exercise your constitutional powers, as do the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy. What would Thad Stevens and Charles Sumner, Sam Randall, and Holman say to a Congress which shirked its responsibilities, abdicated its constitutional functions, voted billions to staffs and bureaus, gave them carte blanche to conduct this great Government, and explained that the daily press said we must do as we are told? There is no excuse for appropriating this $250,000. We will need the money much worse "elsewhere."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been said here this morning that this is a drastic bill. I agree to that. I want to remind the committee that we have not considered any other kind of bills since the beginning of this extraordinary session. We will not pass any other kind, in my opinion, between this time and adjournment. These are drastic times. War is drastic. And I want to remind gentlemen that we are passing through what may be termed the transition period. For years we have been legislating under normal conditions. Scarcely a measure which has passed this House in the past two months would have received a moment's consideration if conditions had been normal.

We may as well make up our minds now that we have got to face conditions as they actually exist; that war can not be conducted by town meetings. War is inimical to democracy. It must be conducted in an autocratic way. No general in command of an army can afford to submit the next move to a referendum. Power has got to be lodged with some person in supreme control, who will be able and have the intelligence to meet conditions as they are confronting him day by day and hour by hour.

Now, some object to lodging this great power in the President. This law provides that the President may make certain rules and regulations to carry out the intentions or provisions of this bill. I can not bring myself to believe that there is a man upon the floor of this House who doubts the intelligence or patriotism of the President. It is ridiculous for anybody to intimate that the President of the United States will promulgate a regulation that would make it a crime for a southern planter to have in his possession a bale of cotton. It is ridiculous to conclude that he is going to hold as criminal the Du Pont Powder Co. because they have a certain amount of explosives in their possession.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I find a statement from an expert here——

Mr. HAMLIN. Just a question.

Mr. RAKER. It is a man who says that the most powerful explosives can be made from ingredients usually accessible in any drug store or elsewhere. In other words, that the drug stores in all places now have all the ingredients that may be used for explosives.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman must not take my time with a speech.

Mr. RAKER. Would this provision require regulation of all the drug stores, too?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir. I do not regret that the gentleman asked the question. If I had time, I had intended to speak of that. The prohibition of manufactures referred to in this bill does not and will not in any sense affect the legitimate manufacturer; but it did develop before the committee, through some testimony that we felt ought not to be printed, that there are certain things of everyday household use that, combined in a certain way, makes the very highest possible explosive, and there are some people, according to the evidence given before the committee, that in common parlance we call "crooks," who are wise to that fact. Much of these explosives can be and will be, perhaps, manufactured illicitly.

Now, then, the purpose of this law is to give authority to the President—of course through some executive department—to hunt out or run down these criminals and prevent the manufacture in this illegitimate and illicit way of explosives to be used for evil purposes.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. HAMLIN. In a moment.

Gentlemen must not forget and this country must not forget that, while we love each other, our population is a cosmopolitan one, and that out of the 100,000,000 people there are here and there black sheep, men who do not love the Stars and Stripes, men who do not even regard their own lives; and while we can not absolutely and entirely prohibit the unlawful manufacture of these explosives and the illegitimate use of them, we do hope by this law, by regulations that would be promulgated, to reduce that illegitimate manufacture and use to the least possible minimum.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, in the hope, however, that I may be able to finish what I wanted to say under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and ingredients thereof, unless such manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession is in compliance with the provisions of, for the purposes set out in, and in the manner provided by the regulations authorized by the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAMLIN, Mr. RAKER, and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] will be recognized first.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think I can conclude what I wanted to say in five minutes. The purpose of this bill is to make it impossible, or as difficult as possible, for those who have evil purposes to procure these explosives. Now, I appreciate and I am in sympathy with the interests of gentlemen, like my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who have great mining industries in his district, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and others, in not wanting the legitimate business that is being prosecuted in their districts to be interfered with. There is absolutely no intention—and I am sure not a single member of that committee had the intention when he voted to report this bill—to interfere with any legitimate business; but there came before that committee men engaged in the legitimate manufacture of explosives, representatives of the Du Pont Powder Co. and also representatives of the miners, who had looked into this matter, and with one accord they advocated the reporting of a bill such as this, with the hope that the illegitimate use of these explosives could be prevented in this country in these times of war.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Was it not the consensus of opinion of at least three of these experts whose testimony I have read that in each community there should be appointed a committee of safety of reputable citizens to look out for the operation of these regulations, and that was held as being a perfectly feasible thing to do, and one that would accomplish much in achieving the end we seek? In other words, pass your laws and regulations, and then enforce them like any other criminal statute. Was not that the consensus of opinion before your committee?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not say it was the consensus of opinion of the committee, but it was the intention of the committee to make provisions, either by this law or by regulations under it, and to properly enforce them and carry out the intention of the law.

Some suggestion has been made here with reference to sections 3 and 4 as to certain employees——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. In just a moment, when I have finished this sentence.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to hold the gentleman to section 1. We will have an opportunity later to get to sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say that, so far as I am concerned, as a member of this committee, I am not wedded to section 4. If it is the judgment of the committee as a whole that this law can be enforced without it, well and good; but there must certainly be somebody provided to look after this matter and ferret out this illegitimate and illicit manufacture and production and distribution, and so forth. It came to the knowledge of the committee that once in a while you would find a miner whose daily work was the handling of dynamite, but under the regulations of the mines he was not presumed to have possession of it except when he went to his work, and then he was required to account for the amount of dynamite given him that morning, either by having exploded it or returning it when his day's work was done. But it came to the knowledge of the committee that sometimes a miner was found who would smuggle away some portion of this dynamite and store it away in his home. Somebody has got to look out for these things. If it can be done with the machinery already at hand, I, as one member of the committee, have no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What I wanted to know was this: Whether the committee considered the enactment of a law without giving authority to the President to make proclamation?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why was not that done?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. It is for the reason that it is a physical impossibility for this committee or this House to sit down here and write a law that would perhaps fit a precise situation that would endure throughout the progress of this entire war. I think the gentleman will appreciate that as we carry out the provisions of this law there will be a situation presenting itself different from that which we have in mind now, and that the law we enact here would not cover every condition which might develop. Therefore we put in this bill the right of the President to change from time to time these regulations to meet the changing situation. This I regard as necessary.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I have always been willing, and am willing now, to delegate to this administration and to the centralized powers that we have here sufficient authority adequately to take care of the serious condition that confronts us. But there are some matters, it seems to me, that at this time need our careful consideration. It seems to me that the enactment of blanket laws, without any specific limitation, carrying certain sums of money to be spent at will here at Washington, at a period of time when we are taxing the people of this country more heavily than they have ever been taxed before, ought to have our most careful consideration. [Applause.]

Why should we to-day delegate the authority under section 4 to expend the sum of $250,000 here in the District of Columbia for horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles? Recently I went down in front of the War Department, and I saw a very handsome Hudson Super Six car. I walked around to the Army and Navy Club shortly afterwards and saw its mate, another handsome seven-passenger Super Six car, the kind manufactured by Mr. Howard Coffin, who is doing great service for our country here. I went to another place, and I found a third car of the same type. I asked, "Whose cars are these?" I was told, "These are cars recently purchased by the Aviation Corps. The Aviation Corps needs these cars for use in the District of Columbia." Why should the Aviation Corps or any other one department here suddenly need three handsome seven-passenger Super Six Hudson cars?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. When did we appropriate the money for these cars?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I do not know of any specific authority, nor have I been able to learn of any specific authority for their purchase. Sitting on the front seat of each one of these cars was a private of the United States Army in United States Army uniform, fine-looking fellows, sitting up there as chauffeurs for these distinguished gentlemen to ride in great state around to the various buildings and in the city of Washington, to inspect the Aviation Corps.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not a Hudson Super Six a flying machine?

Mr. RAGSDALE. It comes pretty near it on a good road. It hits it up pretty smoothly, and it is one of the most agreeable cars in which to ride. You know they are used sometimes even in high society, to go to pink teas, but just what they add to the Aviation Corps I am unable to say.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman owns one of those machines, does he not?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes; but it is paid for out of my money and not out of the money that is being wrung from the taxpayers of the United States. [Applause.] And there is not sitting on the front box of it a man in the uniform of the United States Army at a time when we need them all at the front with the flag, when we need them so badly that we have passed conscription laws to go into the homes of the people of this country and take therefrom the boys of the fathers and mothers in order to defend their country, and not to drive Hudson Super Sixes around the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this body intrusted with the power that it has, this body that is delegating so great power to-day and taxing the people of this country as it is, should stop and think before it goes further, and see how this money is to be used that it is wringing from the people—the manufacturers, the laborers, the farmers, the people of all classes, who now comprise the great American Nation that must win the battle of democracy if it is to be won at all. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in hearty accord with the purposes of this bill. Legislation of this kind is bound to work beneficially. We have legislation of a similar character in the States in regard to narcotic drugs, opium, and other poisons. We have in some States laws in regard to explosives. They work well and are enforcible just like the law that makes it a crime to steal. You enforce the law concerning explosives just like you enforce the law prohibiting a man from committing a criminal trespass on your property or from tearing down your fence. The Legislature of California passed an act on this subject, and it ought to be used as a semi-model on this subject before we get through. That is the act of March 21, 1911, California Statutes of 1911, page 391.

Notwithstanding that legislation there have been bomb explosions since the enactment of that law, since the destroying of the Times Building at Los Angeles. One of the gentlemen who appeared before the committee said that after the enactment of the California law there were no explosions of bombs that he had heard of destroying people; but he had overlooked the fact that this law is just like the law against murder. It is unlawful to take a man's life; but there are men's lives taken every day, and it is murder. It is unlawful to steal, and yet thefts are committed every day. It is unlawful to burglarize a man's house, yet burglary is committed every night, as well as breaking into houses in the daytime. Notwithstanding the stringent law concerning explosives, people on Market Street in San Francisco were destroyed last year by a bomb exploded in broad daylight. Now, I simply call the attention of the committee to that for this purpose——

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that as the testimony shows it is impossible to prevent all these explosions. So it is impossible, as the gentleman says, to prevent all murders, but this is intended to try to reduce these crimes to the minimum.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I want to go on and illustrate. Every criminal statute has been violated from the time it was enacted down to the present day. If crime was not committed, there would be no need for the statute. But the statute is intended to deter men, to prevent the recurrence, to put the fear of God in the hearts of men as well as the fear of the law. Now, what I want to get at is this: This ought to be a plain, clear, penal statute. When the authority is given to the President to make rules and regulations, those rules and regulations when issued become a penal statute. There is no question on earth about that. In other words, you can not do indirectly what you can not do directly. Being a penal statute, it ought to be clear and specific, as it is in the States where such legislation has been enacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask for five minutes more, because I want to complete this thought.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield just now. I want to ask the committee if it is wise to place a drastic penal statute on the statute books and take from all governmental officials, not only in the United States but in the States, municipalities, and counties, the enforcement of the law? Do you want to take it from the sheriffs, and change the functions of the district attorneys? Do you want to change the functions of the many special agents under the Department of Justice now at work on all the penal statutes by these provisions? You ought to make it harmonious, make it a strictly penal statute, so that when the special agents under the district attorney's office is investigating the violation of a law on one subject he will find the man who has violated the explosive statute.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Has the gentleman's attention been directed to the third section, which provides that all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act when acting by the direction of the Bureau of Mines?

That contemplates the use of the very agency that the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. RAKER. Here comes the question. We have got all of this machinery from the constable up through the various grades in the States. We have all the agencies in the National Government to enforce the various laws, and when you have designated that the handling of certain explosives and the storage of them shall be unlawful, will not all the citizens in the community in which you live know the man that is violating the law, just as they know the man that steals your property, will know that it is unlawful to transport it in a certain way and store it in certain places or having certain quantities in their possession, and will they not know it and report to the police officers and to the citizens, and will not the special agents and others immediately investigate it and find out the facts and punish the man, just like every other man who violates any other penal statute is apprehended?

Now, I want to call attention of the chairman and the committee because I want to help them. I would like to see them put a drastic law on the statute books that will be workable and that will not create any new officers. We do not need them, we have a corps of officers that will make the law effective.

No man, I care not who he is or where he comes from, can be in favor of permitting a man to use explosives unlawfully. Why, it is said that a man can go to a drug store and purchase materials to make the most powerful explosive. Let us not, Mr. Chairman, create a new bureau, create a new department to enforce a criminal law. It is unlawful under the statute to sell liquor to a man in uniform. Do you want a special bureau and agents to enforce that law? No; the man that sees him sell it to the man knows that he is guilty and can prosecute him in some way. It is unlawful to be within a mile or a mile and a half of an arsenal. Do you want a body of men to enforce that regulation? No, gentlemen; you ought to take the officers that we already have to enforce these penal statutes. This bill can and should be amended to make it workable. There are amendments suggested that will add much to the workability of this proposed law, and we should see to it that it is done and then pass the bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not see why this bill should come from the Committee on Mines, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois whom we all esteem so much. It has no particular relation to the business of mining.

In the community in which I live there are 25,000 miners. Nearly all of them live in my county, and I am their spokesman and repre-entative here. Naturally I feel a great interest in anything that affects their interests so intimately as explosives. On an examination of the bill I find that it does not relate to mining any more than to many other callings. It touches the miner, it is true, but it touches as well the farmer who would blow up his stumps, and the man who would go into the fields with a few cartridges in his pocket to hunt. It touches even the boy with a bunch of firecrackers who would like to set them off on a holiday. In other words, we are here delegating to the President of the United States, not to the present President, but to any President, not during this war only, but during any war, the power to make regulations which would affect the lives of a great part of our people. Not only does it affect explosives and their manufacture, but it affects the occupations of everybody who is connected with the handling of the materials going into the explosives. It touches the man who has cotton in his possession, the man who has glycerine, perhaps even the man who has a pile of sawdust which might be the basis for the mixing of dynamite. It touches the blacksmith who has a little charcoal to make a fire in his furnace because it may be made into powder.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know that ordinary earth is an ingredient of dynamite?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; certain kinds of earth.

I would say this: I would favor a proper law regulating the handling of explosives, but we are not passing a law when we pass this bill. We are merely abdicating what power the Congress has. [Applause.] Worse than that, we are turning the power over to a bureau, and, worse than that, we are turning it over to some little whipper-snapper agent from the Bureau of Mines who will be going over the country and abusing the power that Congress has delegated. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman's own State provides that the railroad commission shall provide regulations, and if they do not follow them they are punished.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Section 2, line 6, provides regulations for the storage of material. Could not the Government compel the farmer to store his cotton in a brick building?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Under this bill the President of the United States can make a regulation which would require a man to do anything which he might deem proper in storing, handling, or using cotton, charcoal, glycerine, or anything else that enters into the manufacture of explosives.

I oppose the bill because it is unconstitutional. It is an invasion of the rights of the States to control their own police powers. The fact that war is going on now is not the reason for this legislation but the excuse for it. That is the situation. By the bill it is not intended to prevent the enemy from making encroachments upon our territory. We are not called upon to enact it to defend ourselves from a foreign foe. The purpose of the bill is to defend ourselves from our own people. It is to preserve order. I quite applaud that purpose, but under our form of government it is a purpose that belongs to the separate States. The police powers belong to the States, and the National Government should not take advantage of the occasion of war to usurp powers which the founders of the Republic wisely and justly gave to the States exclusively.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can not the same be said about the food-survey bill that we passed yesterday?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not think so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How would the gentleman differentiate?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have not time to take that up now. I will let the gentleman reach his own conclusions about that. The passage of this bill will constitute usurpation on the part of the National Government under the guise of a war measure of the police powers that belong to the States. The purpose of the bill is to promote public order and peace, and those are matters which are exclusively within the province of the States. The purpose of the bill is to control the activities of the citizens of this country, our own people right here at home. Never should we take advantage of the occasion of war in order to cut off rights and liberties that belong to ourselves.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman from Alabama make this distinction: That whereas the statutes which in normal times regulate the use or storage of explosives are properly a part of the police powers of a State, yet in a time of war all of the States collectively, regardless of their independent statutes, are under attack, and there must be some way of coordinating the means of defense?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The question of interstate commerce of course is a matter of vital interest to all of the public, and the blowing up of a railroad bridge necessarily affects that; but it is sometimes done in time of peace in course of strikes, and at various other times of disorder. If the gentleman can justify this bill under the present circumstances, he could justify a bill which would place in the hands of the Government the power to control and regulate the use of explosives in time of peace on the ground of protecting interstate commerce.

I object to this bill because it is unconstitutional. It is a mere subterfuge. It is intended to do something that the States have done from the very beginning of this Republic. We ought not now to lose those powers that the States have reserved to themselves.

Next, this bill, as I have said, is merely an abdication of the power of Congress. If Congress is going to regulate the handling of explosives, let us here take hold of the subject boldly and handle it ourselves. There are surely some things that Congress can do with reference to explosives, some laws that we can pass that will be proper and wise. Why should we delegate all of our functions and powers to a bureau?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is aware that chapter 9 of the Criminal Code of the United States deals exclusively with explosives and the regulation of their transportation, and so forth?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Oh, yes; it has to do with that subject.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would this bill, if enacted into law, enable the President to make a rule or regulation that would repeal any portion of that?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would not like to pass upon that legal question, but undoubtedly the purpose of the bill is in conflict with that chapter. If Congress was able at that time to pass suitable laws, why can we not pass them now? I can not see any reason for turning this power over to the President.

I object to the bill further upon the ground of public policy. I am not willing to pass far-reaching laws such as this purposes to be, and such as this contemplates the regulations would be, laws which would make it unlawful under heavy penalties, as proposed in this bill, to do ordinary things in connection with the use of explosives. A coal digger with a piece of fuse a foot long in his possession left over from his previous day's work might have to go to the penitentiary. A boy with a few cartridges in his pocket going bird hunting might have to go to the penitentiary. Are you going to take away from the people their right to do these ordinary things? Their rights are not safeguarded here.

The Constitution of the United States seems to be a very unpopular instrument these days, but perhaps it has not been wholly forgotten in this House. I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the Constitution guarantees to every American citizen the right to bear arms.

Under this measure—and I call the fact to the attention of the committee for their serious consideration—the President can say, "Oh, yes; go on and bear arms as the Constitution gives you the right to do; but you shall not have any ammunition for your guns. You may bear arms; you may have a shillalah or a brickbat or some other weapon; you may even carry a gun on your shoulder, but you can not have any ammunition." Are you willing to take away from the American people the right to have a gun in the house? Have we come to that, that we are willing to take away from the people of this country under such a subterfuge as is presented here the right to have a pistol and cartridges in the home for protection from burglars?

Are we to have agents of the Government obtruding themselves into the people's homes, searching for ammunition and for explosives, abusing the forbearance and patience of the people? I submit if we do not intend that we should not pass any such far-reaching bill as this.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think, even admitting some of the unreasonable regulations that the President might make, that the President in a time like this should not have the right to make them?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think the President ought to have power to forbid a citizen from having a pistol and cartridges in his home? I have no doubt such a regulation may be adopted if this bill is passed.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Section 1, page 1, amend by striking out, in line 5, the words "unless such"; also by striking out lines 6 to 9, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "In such manner as to be detrimental to the public safety."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the Clerk read the section as it will be if the amendment is adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and ingredients thereof in such manner as to be detrimental to the public safety.

Mr. WINGO. Something has been said about State rights. I do not think that question arises in this case. There may be some question whether or not Congress, under the war power granted to it by the express grant of the Constitution and the implied powers flowing from that grant, can enact such a law as this; but if it has the power, and I believe it has, the exercise of that power is not dependent upon nor does it conflict with the rights of the States. I am a firm believer in the doctrine of State rights, but I am not blind to the facts of history, which point conclusively to the inability of the States as separate units to wage war in defense of collective national rights and for the welfare of the entire Nation. The framers of the Constitution had just been through the Revolutionary War, with the sad experience of the Colonies fighting separately, and that experience demonstrated the necessity of forming a Union in order to provide for the common defense; and in framing the articles of that Union, called the Constitution, they expressly granted to Congress the power to declare war, and I am convinced that flowing from that express grant is the implied power to do all things necessary for the successful prosecution of the war and to protect the public safety against those dangers that are incident to war. Of course such power must be exercised in a manner consistent with our institutions and form of government as established and set out by the Constitution as a whole. If under the Constitution the Federal Government and not the State governments have the power to defend the Nation against the danger of a bomb thrown by soldiers of the enemy, then has not Congress the power to provide for the defense of public safety against the bomb thrown by a spy of the enemy? And if Congress decides that the best means to guard against this danger is by control and regulation of the manufacture, sale, use, and possession of the explosives that compose the bomb, is not Congress acting within the scope of its constitutional power?

But gentlemen say that by such laws as this the people's liberties are destroyed. I can not agree with such a proposition. There is no foundation for such a fear. I not only believe in liberty, but I have faith in the ability of this Nation to use its liberty. I am not one of those men who are afraid that we are going to lose our liberty by exercising it. I repeat it; I am not one of those men who are afraid we are going to lose our liberty by exercising it. If the Representatives of the people, for the benefit of the people and in order to insure the public safety in time of war, want a statute like this, it will not endanger the liberties of the people to give them the protection of such a statute.

Mr. JUUL. If I understand the situation correctly, it is not that the gentlemen here object to the passage of a criminal statute, but it is the fact that the bill asks this bureau to pass a criminal statute, or, rather, allows the Bureau of Mines to enact one.

Mr. WINGO. I know what the gentleman's objection is.

Mr. JUUL. Are we not asking to-day to enact a criminal statute, the details of which criminal statute are to be determined on later?

Mr. WINGO. No.

Mr. JUUL. Are we not shutting our eyes here and saying to another body, "You go and enact a criminal statute that we have voted 'yea' on here to-day?" Is not that the effect?

Mr. WINGO. No; that is not the effect.

Mr. JUUL. Then I do not understand the bill.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will not use all my time, I will try to explain the bill.

Mr. JUUL. I am trying to make myself clear. The gentleman and myself are trying to travel along the same line.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has made himself clear. Are we delegating to the President the power to make a law and punish anybody who violates it? That is the gentleman's question.

Mr. JUUL. What is the law? Will the gentleman tell me?

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will just permit me to, I will.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will tell me now what it is that is made unlawful——

Mr. WINGO. All right. I am going to do it if the gentleman will permit me to do so.

Mr. JUUL. It is not in the bill yet.

Mr. WINGO. Now, let us see. This proposition gave the committee, and every lawyer on that committee, considerable concern. Not only did it give us concern from a legal standpoint but from the standpoint of those who are jealous of and do not propose to delegate authority to anybody as long as it can be escaped. I am not only opposed to delegating power to the President to legislate but I am in favor of the legislative body enacting even administrative details when possible, practicable, and necessary.

Let us see whether we have kept within the rule. Has Congress by this bill declared something substantive to be a crime? Does it prohibit something? Now, let us see what it does. We say that the manufacture during this war, and the distribution, and so forth, of these high and dangerous explosives are unlawful if they are done in such a manner as to be detrimental to the public safety. Does not Congress, then, by that language enact a substantive inhibition a violation of which is punishable as a crime? We say that the manufacture, and so forth, of these high explosives during this war in a manner detrimental to the public safety shall be unlawful. That is your substantive act.

Mr. DYER. Who is to determine that?

Mr. WINGO. Let me finish. I want to get through my whole proposition. If I am wrong, I want to be corrected. I agree with you as to the basic rule that should govern us, and the question is whether or not we have followed the correct rule.

By section 1 we make it unlawful to manufacture, sell, and so forth, dangerous explosives in a manner detrimental to public safety, and by section 2 we authorize the President to make the necessary rules and regulations governing the manufacture, sale, and so forth, of these explosives for proper and necessary purposes; and in order to protect those who manufacture, sell, or possess these explosives for proper and necessary purposes it is provided by the amendment I have pending that their actions shall not be deemed detrimental to the public safety or unlawful if done in compliance with the rules and regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may have five minutes more. He is making a very interesting and instructive statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Now, gentlemen, if you will take a copy of the bill and turn to section 2 you will see what power we delegate to the President. I think we delegate to the President, as narrowly as we can under the circumstances, the right to provide administrative rules and regulations, but no power is given to create a criminal offense by mere Executive proclamation. We do not go as far in this bill as Congress went in the act covering the transportation of explosives. The first section of that act absolutely prohibited the transportation by carriers of any explosives and then by section 2 provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission should make rules and regulations covering the transportation by carriers of these explosives. But some gentlemen who oppose this bill are willing to trust that commission but can not trust a President.

I object to any President, no matter to what party he may belong, exercising authority that can be exercised more effectively by the Representatives of the people, but administrative rules and regulations at times can best be left to Executive detail. But let us see if we have narrowed this authority as much as we can and at the same time have accomplished what is necessary. Suppose we undertook to do what the gentleman from Alabama has suggested; suppose that this legislative body undertook to provide these administrative rules and regulations, which do not constitute the act itself, but are predicated upon an act of Congress and have no foundation or authority whatever, except as they are resting upon a crime declared and defined by statute; that is, to wit, the manufacture, sale, and so forth, of explosives in a manner detrimental to the public safety.

Let us see what we could do. Let gentlemen undertake to say in their own minds what kind of regulations should be provided. Gentlemen could sit around the committee table in the committee room for several days and define the different things and Congress might consider rules and regulations for days, but the experience of us all is that probably the very danger that subsequent experience might show we need to guard against would be the one that Congress would overlook, or the committee would overlook, and everybody knows that if we undertook to set out a single one of these details or undertook to say specifically that any certain method of manufacture is that which is prohibited, then every other method would be permissible under the law, however dangerous it might be to the public safety.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. WINGO. Not right now. I think every lawyer will see what the danger is. I will not undertake to quote Latin, but the lawyers understand the Latin quotation that would be apt there; when you undertake to include one you exclude all others. And so you will see that the members of the committee who are lawyers, and upon whom devolved the duty of framing this statute properly, had a very narrow path in which to travel. If we could undertake to do what I would like to do, we might endeavor to write the administrative details here as to how things should be done, and what should be done; but we would be writing a code on explosives, and the acts of the shrewd, ingenious criminals which we want to prohibit disturbing the public safety would be the very ones that we possibly would overlook, however ingenious and careful we might be.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The question I have in mind is this: Some one will have to prepare these regulations and make them as specific as a penal statute must be. Why can not a committee of Congress reduce those regulations to the form of a statute quite as well as somebody acting under the authority of the President? In either case the regulations will have to be specific in order to be enforced and to meet the penalties provided in section 5 of this act.

Mr. WINGO. I think not, if the amendment I offered is adopted. Let me be frank on this matter, and I think I ought to be frank with the House. We had present representatives of every one who was interested in the bill; we had representatives of the miners and the mine operators; we had representatives of the explosive concerns, the powder concerns, and others, and also chemists and all classes represented before our committee. We went into this matter thoroughly, and before we reported this bill—and we did that unanimously—it was decided that when the regulations were finally prepared the Bureau of Mines would not only consult the powder men and the miners and the operators and the different ones that might be injured by an unwise administration, but that when they had been agreed upon the Bureau of Mines would come before our committee, and we would go over them with the bureau officials and call in the representatives of the factories and the miners and the operators and others concerned. In other words, there is no intention here to exercise arbitrary power.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. REED. You mean this to be a temporary law, to be in force during the term of this war? I notice you use the term "this war." You say in the third line "in time of war." That might be a war affecting Mexico or Canada. Why not confine it to this war?

Mr. WINGO. The bill says "in time of war." The spies and representatives of foreign Governments have been here, as we know. They have been in our country trying to blow up public works and public buildings. I do not propose, under such circumstances, to quibble when the very security of the Nation is at stake. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. REED. You mean this law would not be in effect after the war? Is that the meaning? Do these powers end with the war?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. Have we not been following the plan in this emergency legislation of alluding to the present war as the "war with the Imperial German Government"?

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, there are other things that I want to say; and, frankly, I will say that we have not the authority to enact legislation like this except in time of war. When I say "war" I do not care whether it is with Timbuktu or Germany. If public necessity requires us to prosecute that war with the least danger to our internal life and with the greatest efficiency in our fighting force against the outside foe, I think we should do it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I understand the gentleman believes this act should go on the statute books and operate only in time of war?

Mr. WINGO. Yes. I catch the point of the gentleman's suggestion, and will say that we are making it a permanent statute and not limiting it to this war, but the act operates only in time of war. The reason we want to make this a permanent law and make it applicable in time of war is this: Wars come on suddenly, and possibly in the future we might have a war wherein the necessity for this act would become apparent; and yet the rush of other matters, such as we have here now, might give those better equipped, and carrying on their operations in a more dangerous way than they have been in the last 60 days, an opportunity to do a great deal of harm before a statute could be enacted. For that reason we thought it better to make a permanent statute, applicable only in time of war, because under the Constitution I do not think we would have any right to apply it except in time of war.

Mr. TOWNER. The first section of the bill is an absolute prohibition, is it not?

Mr. WINGO. Not with the amendment I have offered.

Mr. TOWNER. As it stands in the bill it is an absolute prohibition?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. So that no one can do any of the acts prohibited there unless allowed to do them under the proclamation of the President. In other words, the President's proclamation must be so inclusive that all legitimate things will be included.

Mr. WINGO. Did the gentleman hear my amendment?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I did not.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will pardon me, I meet the gentleman's objection by offering an amendment to strike out all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9 and the words "unless such" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in such manner as to be detrimental to the public safety." That meets the gentleman's objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Then would there be any necessity at all for section 2?

Mr. WINGO. I think there might be.

Mr. TOWNER. What would be the reason for it? Because then the question would be as to whether it were detrimental to the public safety.

Mr. WINGO. That is true; but does not the gentleman think it wise for the President by proper proclamation to undertake to define those things for the benefit of the citizens? If he did not do it, any one might come along and say, "Well, you are manufacturing and handling explosives in a certain way that is detrimental to the public safety," and he might be harassed by persecutions and prosecutions that would become persecutions; and I think for the safety of the public what is considered to be detrimental ought to be set out very clearly by public proclamation, so that everyone may have notice, and we will not have some man persecuted because of a dispute as to whether or not his act was detrimental to the public safety.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is a good lawyer, and he knows very well the necessity in a penal statute of making definite the things that are prohibited, so that everyone will know them. Now, if the determining proposition is as to whether it is detrimental to the public interest, that is a question that we might discuss; but if in addition you say that whatever the President proclaims shall be exempted from the provisions of the law, then we do not know anything at all about it.

Mr. WINGO. I did not say that.

Mr. TOWNER. Because we do not say anything at all about that.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to put that interpretation on my statement.

Mr. TOWNER. I am not putting it on the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WINGO. I was careful not to say what the gentleman has just said I said.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is a very necessary statute at this time, and I intend to support it, with the exception of sections 2 and 3, which I do not think are necessary.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Sections 3 and 4.

Mr. BORLAND. Sections 3 and 4. We will dispose of them when we come to them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman was right about sections 2 and 3.

Mr. BORLAND. But I want to say a word here in regard to the general purpose and scope of this statute. I represent one of the great markets of the mining district of the West for explosives, and therefore I realize that explosives occupy a very large and a very legitimate place in American industry. There is no intention in this bill to interfere with the safe and legitimate use of explosives. But there has grown up in the last few years, as explosives have developed and more people have become acquainted with them, a species of the most dastardly crimes which can be committed through the agency of explosives. And because explosives have a legitimate place in American industry that is no reason why we should leave their use unchecked and unrestrained, especially in a time of public peril. There is no intention to reach anything except what I regard as the most dastardly species of criminal act, more dastardly than the old-fashioned crime of poisoning. There is no more dastardly crime than that which can be committed by means of modern explosives. In regard to the question that is raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], I want to say that this bill is drawn legally upon the war powers of the Constitution and could not rest upon any other. It does not attempt to be drawn under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, for then it would be limited to the transportation of explosives in interstate commerce. That is provided for now in a section of the Revised Statutes. We could not go into the States except for the purpose of preserving the public safety and providing for the common defense. So gentlemen might just as well get clear in their own minds now the legal distinction between the purely war powers of the Constitution and the purely peace powers of the Constitution. I am inclined to think it might be desirable to regulate the penal affairs of this great Nation upon a uniform basis, and I am inclined to think that we will some day come to that and have a national criminal code; but under the Constitution we can not now have a national criminal code, except in so far as the acts done are in violation of laws passed under the legitimate powers of Congress. But in time of war we are providing a national criminal code. There is no legal distinction between this bill and the food-control bill. Both of them rest upon precisely the same power, and neither could be justified under the interstate-commerce clause or any other clause of the Constitution in time of peace. Now, we might just as well get that clear in our own minds.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, and I know other Members are, as to how far we can go under the war powers. The gentleman has given a great deal of study to it, and will he state his idea of that, if he has one?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I do not see any distinction in the exercise of powers of legislation for the common defense between the general powers of legislation now enjoyed by the sovereign States and the United States. In other words, I think that in the time of war we step right squarely into the shoes of the sovereign States having all the powers of the State in general legislation for the safety and the health and the morals of the population, the great bulk of legislation known as the police powers of the State.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am rather surprised at the statement of the gentleman. Do I understand that he places it on the broad power of legislation for the common defense?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; does not the gentleman?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not; I think it is under the enumerated and implied powers growing out of the express powers under the declaration of war.

Mr. BORLAND. I would be glad to hear the gentleman's limitations on that power.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a moment. My conception is that in time of peace the establishment of regulations are confined to interstate commerce, postal regulations, violation of the revenue law, and all crimes committed under those different attributes—the admiralty, and so on. We do not have the wide and unrestricted police powers of the several States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. But in time of war to legislate for the common defense we then unquestionably step into the wider range of power. What those powers are has never been clearly defined as far as I know, and yet I can see no necessary limitation to them but the full scope of the police power of the several States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not reasonable to suppose that the right granted by the Constitution to declare war must of necessity carry with it every possible means to make the war successful?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Which is practically no limitation of the interpretation of the words "national defense."

Mr. BORLAND. I can see no limitation except the limitation that will occur to the exercise of police powers by these powers.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If I understand the question of the gentleman from Vermont and the reply of the gentleman from Missouri, the Constitution of the United States was adopted only for the time of peace. In time of war the Constitution is done away with and all power is in the Executive and the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. That is to me an astounding statement.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not say all powers.

Mr. BORLAND. No; the gentleman from Wisconsin says all powers of the Constitution are done away with. Of course, that is too broad.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to reply. I did not make such a statement as is made by the gentleman from Wisconsin. I said the country has the power to declare war and the country has every possible power to try to make the war successful. There can be no escape from the logic of that. Otherwise it would be foolish to go into the war. In reply to a question I hear addressed to me by a Member, I may say that I would rather save the country than the Constitution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not agree to that.

Mr. BORLAND. I was about to say that the gentleman from Vermont goes a step beyond my statement. My statement was in effect that whereas in time of peace the Federal Government has no common law, no general police powers except as incidentally enumerated, in time of war it has those police powers, and this is an example of its exercise.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to read, and it will only take a moment, the opinion of a very eminent lawyer in this part of the country, as all will agree, an opinion by ex-Attorney General KNOX, now a member of the United States Senate, and I think his opinion will have weight with the committee. He says:

The Constitution must always be construed in such a manner as to give effect to all of its powers. The war power in the Constitution stands upon the same authority as the other powers in the Constitution, and it is a sound and well-recognized rule of construction of any instrument that, if possible, it must be construed so as to give meaning to all of its parts. When the fathers said in the Constitution that Congress should have the right to declare war, and that it alone should have that power, they did not undertake to define what war is. They dealt with a status that was well known; and when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the right to declare war, it by necessary implication conferred upon Congress the right to do anything that in its judgment was necessary to carry that war to a successful conclusion.

The war powers of the Constitution, in my opinion, are dormant until a status of war is declared by Congress, and then they may be exercised with limitation or qualification to the extent that the safety of the Nation demands. Of this Congress is the judge, except as the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, in the actual conduct of the war, and in a case of great emergency or dire necessity may be compelled to act.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to the gentleman from Missouri for reading that opinion of an ex-Attorney General of the United States who does not happen to belong to my party, but it is fully as broad as my statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In answer to the learned opinion of the former Attorney General, this is what the Supreme Court of the United States says in the case of Ex parte Milligan:

Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irreparable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Kansas has read a learned extract from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States without any possible insight into the context in which it was used, without any connection at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Having a direct bearing upon this matter.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say to the gentleman that if he adheres to the doctrine that the United States has no general police powers in time of war that it has not in time of peace, he could not vote for this bill nor for the food-control bill or for half of the legislation at this session of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit in reply to the gentleman just a word? The gentleman certainly does not conclude that the opinion of the court which he has just read in any way contradicts the opinion of ex-Attorney General KNOX which I just read a while ago?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Most certainly, because the opinion of the ex-Attorney General placed it upon the doctrine of necessity.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. KNOX says that the Constitution in time of war clearly by implication gives the power, and that when we do these things we are acting within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But In re Milligan the court was construing a question growing out of the Civil War.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman speaks about the police power. I want to ask the gentleman whether he has ever read a case or read anything that any writer on constitutional law has ever said supporting his position that the National Government has no police power in time of war different from that in time of peace, and I want to remind the gentleman that the opinion of Senator KNOX, with which I am in accord, is not at all the basis upon which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] rests his case.

Mr. BORLAND. The opinion of Senator KNOX is certainly not only clearer, but more far reaching than any opinion that I have expressed.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. In just a minute. I have expressed the opinion that whereas the United States might not have general police powers in time of peace, it has general police powers in time of war to provide for the common defense and the national safety. Senator KNOX says they have power to do anything for the successful prosecution of war.

Mr. LENROOT. This is an implied power from enumerated power, namely, the power to declare war.

Mr. BORLAND. And I limit the power by all constitutional limitations against the taking of property, and so forth, but his words are much broader.

There is just one more thing that I desire to discuss, because most of you are much more competent to discuss these constitutional questions than I. I want to discuss the question of regulation as opposed to definition in the law. This is another question that has arisen in my mind in connection with all of this war legislation. We are going to be confronted in all of these bills with an enlarged power of regulation by Executive order. I have weighed in my own mind the advantages and disadvantages, the dangers, and the results of government by regulation or legislation for regulation, and I have come to this conclusion, that in the present emergency that is the wise course to pursue. I will tell you why. This particular case illustrates it. It might be possible for us, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] suggested, to get some one from the Bureau of Mines or some other expert to draft an explosive act and then enact it into law, but that law would be rigid. If Congress adjourns, then the Executive must enforce the law according to the letter, regardless of the circumstances or conditions. In many cases it would let criminals escape——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Ought not a criminal law to be rigid?

Mr. BORLAND. In many cases it would let criminals escape and in others bear unjustly on legitimate business. How does regulation differ from that? Regulation is a flexible method. It can be changed and adjusted to not only the circumstances in mind when the law was passed, but the time which the regulations ought to cover, and the regulations can be modified or revised or amended or repealed from time to time as the emergency disappears or as the emergency arises, while the rigid words of the statute can not.

We would do a great injury to legitimate business in this country if in the food-control bill or in this bill relating to great industries in the country we should make a rigid rule which we deemed was necessary and far-reaching enough to provide for the public safety. It is much wiser and much more practicable and much safer for the farmer and the miner and the business man that we should leave that matter to the flexible method of regulation than that we should put it into rigid law. I have so advised every business man who came to me in fear of the operation of these statutes. I have said to him that he should have his voice before the executive department as to the effect of these proposed regulations on his legitimate business, and that the regulations would be drafted and modified from time to time so as not to interfere or so as to interfere to the minimum extent with legitimate business, but that if we were to be driven to enacting rigid statutes, definite language where we thought it would protect the people where they ought to be protected, and guard against every possible danger which we thought ought to be guarded against, we would be sure to tear down a great many legitimate businesses in this country.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most interesting discussions I think we have had at this session, and for this reason: It points out very clearly the trend of the American legislative mind. For the past 20 years we have been more and more depending upon the policeman to run the Government, whether in municipal, county, State, or National affairs. We have been multiplying laws, almost without number, attaching penalties thereto, and then calling in the police power of the community to make people good. The National Congress in this session, a Democratic Congress, so called, is doing more to encourage the development of an autocracy than any Republican Congress we ever saw.

Now, that did not all happen in a minute. These things are the result of an evolution of thought, and the thing that is now proposed to turn over to the President—namely, the right to declare what is a crime and what is not, after your law is passed—is only a sample of all that has been growing up to the present time. Men are justifying a position here to-day which, a quarter of a century ago would absolutely not have been given a moment's consideration in the American Congress.

We are proposing to do what was proposed to do under the espionage bill, namely, to pass a law providing for the punishment of a crime, but to let the crime be designated after the law is passed. It does not make any difference as to whether this thing is necessary or not. I do not think it is. I have more faith in the American people than is evidenced in this bill. I believe that the Secret Service of this country is doing fairly well now looking after all these would-be violators of law. They have sufficient authority now, not only in this department but elsewhere. I am not able to understand why it is that this war has suddenly brought up so many exigencies that never appeared in any other war that we have had. And the men who wrote this Constitution had just come out of war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MEEKER. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was that war in any sense fought with chemicals?

Mr. MEEKER. Oh, no.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is one of the indications as to what may be possible in a modern war.

Mr. MEEKER. I understand; but men in these days deal with chemicals as those men did with battle-axes and gunpowder. The principle is the same. The thing that interests me all the time is our tendency to absolutely set aside the fundamental principles of a free government and the willingness on the part of men to constitute a crime or permit a crime to be designated after you pass the law.

Now, I do not care what may be the exigency, you can not lay down any rule that justifies the American Congress permitting some other man to pass or make, as is declared in this bill, rules and regulations whereby men are to be sent to prison and fined.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I presume the gentleman is a lawyer, judging from his argument. Can he show in this bill anything, after the adoption of the amendment which is proposed by the committee, where the violation of anything set out in the President's regulations could possibly be made a crime?

Mr. MEEKER. Who is to determine?

Mr. WINGO. He does not do it. Under the bill as the amendment is offered, which meets with all the objections which the gentleman is urging, we make it a crime to do these things in a manner that is detrimental to the public safety, by section 2, instead of authorizing the President to go ahead and enumerate things, which, if violated, would be a crime. With that amendment to the first section, the second section is reversed in its original intent from the gentleman's viewpoint, so that if the President indicated the manner by which it might be manufactured the citizen would be protected even though it should afterwards turn out that it might be detrimental to the public safety.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman and I do not yet understand one another. I will ask you this question: Where in this bill, putting in the amendment which has been offered, does it say other than that the President in these rules shall state, but shall not determine, what rules shall be passed, the violation of which shall constitute a crime?

Mr. WINGO. Of course, that is not there. We do not have to declare it. That is not the proposition. If the gentleman will read closely section 2, in line with the amendments that have been offered to section 1, he will have all his fears removed.

Mr. MEEKER. I will put it this way, then. Where in the bill does it provide as to the amendment that you offer?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to ask me that.

Mr. MEEKER. Not in the light of the second paragraph.

Mr. WINGO. I will admit as the first section was originally drawn there might be, from the gentleman's standpoint, something in his contention.

Mr. LENROOT. With the amendment now adopted, does it not amount to this, that the President is given power——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment, and I want to speak on it for five minutes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] can make a motion to shut off debate.

Mr. RAKER. You can not shut off debate. We are engaged in legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. We do not desire to limit debate, but we are anxious to get the bill through. I have requests, Mr. Chairman, for 60 minutes. I hope that at this time we may close debate on this section and all amendments thereto in 65 minutes. That will take us to nearly 4 o'clock.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Let the gentleman take time on the next section.

Mr. RAKER. I have taken very little time heretofore.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 65 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending section and amendments thereto close in 65 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I trust they will yield to me five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. So do I.

Mr. DYER. Regular order!

Mr. FOCHT. Hold on, there——

Mr. RAKER. Right there, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I made that request, Mr. Chairman, for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] objected.

Mr. DYER. No; I asked for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the time be limited to 65 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I object.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I move, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 65 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 65 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is limited to 65 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I did not ask for time along with the others, I ask leave to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent to have an amendment read now that the committee intends to present to section 2. It might meet some of the objections that have been urged against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to have read and pending an amendment which he sends to the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, page 2, by inserting at the end of the section as a part thereof the following:

"Provided further, That it shall not be deemed to be detrimental to the public safety and shall not be unlawful within the meaning of this act to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and the ingredients thereof, when the same shall be done in compliance with such rules and regulations."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Chair follow the list that was agreed upon but which was objected to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the list, including the names that were given then, and the Chair will recognize gentlemen in the order in which they appear on the list, within the time agreed to, on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman's time does not come out of the 65 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin was asking me a question. Will he go ahead with it?

Mr. LENROOT. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that with this amendment adopted the power of the President would determine certain facts, fixing what came within the line of public safety, and therefore the amendment is entirely harmonious with the first section of the bill.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I have only one other observation to make to the committee, and I think I might as well bring it to the attention of the committee now as at a later time. I am averse to the idea that by simply calling a measure "a war measure" that is furnishing a reason sufficient to make it a war measure. I object to this bringing of bills in here, stating that because a state of war exists, or something to that effect, we are to be called upon to do certain things. It is up to the committee to demonstrate, before we vote on this bill, that the Department of Justice and the Secret Service and all the other departments of this Government can not now cope with this situation. To say that this is "a war measure" does not make it so, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Alabama and other men; we are not compelled, as Members of the committee or of the House, to permit men simply to head up a bill and say, "This is a war measure, and the administration wants it, and therefore you must pass it, and thereby set aside all rules, customs, and everything else." I repeat it is up to this committee to show wherein the present machinery of Government for the protection of the lives and property of the people of this country has fallen down.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Right there, in other words, you are going to supplant the splendid laws now in operation in Pennsylvania, for example, by something mythical. We do not know what they are going to be. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MEEKER. Absolutely. Many of the States have already enacted laws in regard to the manufacture, storing, and handling of explosives. These are to be set aside and overridden by a set of rules. As yet we have not heard from this committee one single word as to wherein or how the Department of Justice or any other department of this Government has failed in the protection of the lives and property of the people.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman says that many of the States have laws touching on this subject.

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How about the State that either has no law on the subject or an insufficient one? Is it not a fact that any destruction produced by a party in war in 1 State injures also the other 47 States? Do the other 47 have to sit back and permit that to be done?

Mr. MEEKER. I will reply by asking the gentleman a question. I want to know if he is willing to stand up here and admit that the present machinery of this Government is so broken down that it is not now enforcing the laws for the protection of life and property in this country?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to reply to that now?

Mr. MEEKER. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not understand that there is at present any machinery such as is contemplated by this act.

Mr. MEEKER. Nor will I admit that this machinery is necessary.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I say that the States now regulate this thing under the State police power, and the Federal Government does not now regulate it.

Mr. MEEKER. So I understand, but I do not admit that the machinery that is proposed to be set up here is necessary in any degree whatever.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Suppose there are two or three or four States which have laws covering this subject—the State of Pennsylvania and the State of California and our State of Missouri have some laws in regard to it——

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Suppose 3 or 4 States have splendid laws on this subject, but there are 30 or 40 other States that have no laws at all?

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman is just repeating what the gentleman from Vermont said, only he says three or four.

Mr. HAMLIN. Would the gentleman be willing to let the people of the United States suffer in this time of crisis simply because two or three States have passed such laws, while the others have not?

Mr. MEEKER. I believe that the present equipment of the Government is sufficient for this.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman point it out?

Mr. MEEKER. Our whole secret service. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that our secret service has not been doing efficient work for the last two or three years? This is a confession that the secret service is not doing what it should do. I believe that it is.

The other observation which I want to make at the close of my time, leading to this same thing that I suggested in the beginning, is our constant tendency to leave it more and more to policemen to keep order in this Government, a Government which was intended to be as free of policemen as possible. Think this over, gentlemen, and make it a subject of study. You talk about the increase of crime in this country. I do not believe that our Nation is becoming more criminal; but if you will put your proposition in this way, in the very degree that we increase the number of laws that might be violated and attach penalties thereto, we find that many more excuses for branding the members of society as criminals. That question is seldom discussed, but the increase in the enactment of laws whereby and whereto we attach criminal punishments and penalties is such that there is no other one thing in modern government that is doing so much to fill our courts with boys and girls and men and women as the idiotic policy of constantly writing new police regulations on our statute books. This is a sample of it. What will be proposed next I do not know. Out in Kansas at one time they proposed to prohibit women under 45 years of age from using face powder or wearing false hair. That ought to be a war measure. [Applause and laughter.] It surely would be. We would get into war with the ladies. But now we are going in that direction in this hysteria of having police regulations for everything under heaven. This committee has got to show me that this is a war measure. The mere fact that they have called it such does not make it so, and they have got to show me that the secret-service department of this Government has failed in its work and can no longer deliver the goods in this emergency. I guess that is all. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of the first section of this bill is to prevent harm to life and property in the United States by the use of explosives and things of that kind which may get into possession of people who are enemies of the Government. I desire to offer an amendment and have it pending, in order to accomplish more than could be accomplished if this bill were enacted into law. I take it that changes and amendments will be adopted that will make it possible for us to support this bill. In its present form I would not desire to do so. But on page 1, after the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has been disposed of, I will offer this amendment, to insert in line 3, after the word "to"—

That in time of war it shall be unlawful to injure or destroy by fire or by use of explosives, or by any other violent means, or attempt to so injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utility—

And further on to define what is meant by the words "war premises" and "war utility."

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no law on the statute books that authorizes the punishment of any person for doing the things that are prohibited in this amendment. There ought to be a strict statute upon that subject, and there ought not to be any question about the regulations as to the enforcement of it. It ought to be a law and not a regulation.

Mr. RAKER. I understand the provision is that anyone who destroys any property by fire shall be punished. That is the purpose of your amendment, is it not?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any State in the Union where, if a person destroys any man's property by fire, he is not punishable under the State law?

Mr. BUTLER. Every State law covers that.

Mr. DYER. The Department of Justice has asked for the passage of such a law as this. The Senate has already passed something similar to it, and the Judiciary Committee of the House has drafted a bill as a substitute for that, which includes the portion that I have read, and I am quite sure that it is necessary to take care of situations that may exist in States or Territories that are not covered by effective laws.

Mr. RAKER. This is interesting. What kind of property is there now in existence in any State that if a man destroys it by fire he is not punishable for that act?

Mr. DYER. I do not know of any in my State.

Mr. RAKER. Can the gentleman conceive of any property owned by an individual that if it is destroyed by fire the person destroying it is not punishable under State law? The proposition is so new and startling to me that I am asking for information.

Mr. DYER. Probably in some States the punishment is not sufficient. The department has recommended a very severe penalty for the violation of such a statute. The department has asked that the punishment be fixed at 30 years' imprisonment. This is to punish those who would destroy munition plants and things of that kind, as to which we have had a great deal of trouble.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not the gentleman's experience that there is a punishment for every act committed in the destruction of property by fire? Is not the gentleman familiar with the fact that exorbitant long-term punishments prevent conviction and that this country has succeeded in enforcing the law by making the penalties, both as to fine and imprisonment, so that they can convict? It is the certainty of conviction and not the exorbitant punishment that deters criminals.

Mr. DYER. No; I think in a matter of this kind, where it can be shown that the enemies of the Government have caused explosions which destroy munition plants in war time, the only effective way is to make the punishment very severe. We all have read of the destruction of munition plants, the blowing up of munition plants, and, so far as I have been able to learn, no State has yet brought these perpetrators of the crimes to trial. Apparently no effort has been made, so far as we have been informed through the public press. The Government must take these matters up especially and protect itself, and protect its munitions plants, protect the places where munitions are stored for use in the war. It is most important that we have a very effective provision.

Mr. RAKER. Of course, if it is Government property, the perpetrator can be prosecuted in the Federal court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent to have presented and have pending the amendment that I have offered, and also the definition as to war purposes and munitions as stated in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to have the amendment reported now?

Mr. DYER. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, when I first read this bill it pretty nearly took my breath away, having in mind that which it enabled somebody to do. In the northeastern part of the State of Minnesota—and that situation is true, though perhaps to a lesser degree, in two or three other sections of the United States—dynamite and explosives are playing a great part in the industrial life of the land. Dynamite and explosives have ceased to be something handled exclusively by scientists, something handled exclusively by specialists apart from common use. Explosives, and particularly dynamite, have come to be a common necessity in many of the industrial operations of our people.

We had before us for several days a bill designed to encourage food production in the United States. I could not help thinking all the time that bill was under discussion how much more valuable it would be in the accomplishment of its purpose if something could be done to enlarge the area of production. At the present time in the cut-over timbered sections of the Northwest—and I refer to northern Minnesota, northern Wisconsin, and a portion of Michigan—there are approximately 15,000,000 acres of land now covered by stumps and unproductive, but which have been proven to be the best soil in the best climate of this country for the production of potatoes, grasses, and all root vegetables. Consequently it occurred to me time and time again how much more valuable it would be in the accomplishment of the purpose contained in the food-production bill if we might in some governmental way take upon ourselves the rendering of assistance in clearing that land. It is mostly to be done by dynamite. These hardy farmers that are trying to clear the land are using dynamite. It is the cheapest and the best method that has been discovered. Every day they are using it. This bill makes it a crime for one of these men to have dynamite in his possession unless the President of the United States shall make an order or a rule that will give him permission to have it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman want to discuss the bill in the light of the amendment offered, and if that is adopted the gentleman's statement would not be accurate?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am coming to that in a moment. I am going to complain of the amendment because I do not like it. The other great use to which dynamite and explosives are put in the northeastern part of Minnesota is in the great iron mines, the greatest in all the world, and I have to repeat every once in a while that 65 per cent of all the iron ore at present mined in the United States is mined in the single county in which I live. Dynamite is the basis of all mining operations. This bill says, or it authorizes some one to say, whether or not mining companies can have dynamite for use in mining.

Now, I am not one so foolish or so simple as to think that the President of the United States or the Director of the Bureau of Mines or anybody else will say that it is a crime for a man to have in his possession cotton or sawdust or soil, although they happen to be the ingredients of dynamite, nor do I think that any person will say it is a crime for a mining company to have in its possession dynamite for mining purposes when as a matter of fact the mining of ore is basic to the production of all munitions of every kind and character.

I was fearful when I first read this bill that the operation of it would cripple the mining industry; that it would so hamper and surround the use of the explosive as to make it, perhaps, very expensive if not impossible to carry on mining operations with success and dispatch. I believe that still would be true in a measure if you retain in the bill sections 3 and 4 and authorize them to be carried out as they now contemplate. We propose in the first part of the bill to make certain things a crime, and a little further on in the bill it is proposed to create a body of agents who will go throughout the United States for the purpose of detecting violators of the statute. If we carried that out in all the statutes we pass of a criminal nature what a wonderful opportunity for the employment in the Government service there would be. Every time we said that an act should not be done we would have appointed a body of agents to go throughout the United States and see that it is not done. Of course, we do not need anything of that kind. Nor is there any excuse for it in this instance unless that which it is designed to prohibit can not be carried out by the State and local agents. And yet in paragraph 3 it is proposed that the local instrumentalities shall be utilized.

Now, to reach that which I desire to emphasize, if you will cut sections 3 and 4 out of the bill—and perhaps if they are not cut out—I am going to vote for it, for two or three reasons that did not occur to me at first, having in mind that dynamite is now an industrial necessity and the fact that its use ramifies out through the most of our industrial life. I recognize that to repose in the President or anyone else power absolutely to control the keeping and manufacture and use of dynamite is tremendous. It may result in serious things, but I am led to agree to this first part of the bill for the reason that in a time of war we must intrust power to the Executive in an abnormal and remarkable degree. We must do one thing further. We must even authorize the Executive to take action even in cases that are innocent if to grant that authority is necessary in order that he may have the power to take action in cases where guilt resides. What I mean by that is this: It may be necessary to put into the hands of the President or some appropriate official under him control over certain things, it being expected he will not exercise that authority and that control in order that he may have the power to control those things that should be controlled. In the iron-mining regions of nearly every part of the United States to-day there is a deep and serious menace. We have had attention directed to the outrages by dynamite. They are not in the far past. Many of them are near at hand. I believe the power in this bill wisely exercised by the President will be for the protection of American property and American lives by reason of the war conditions that now exist. I am not violating any confidence nor am I stating anything that, in my judgment, needs to be concealed when I say that in some of the mining sections of the United States to-day active forces are in operation that are designed to put the mines out of business, that are designed to destroy methods of communication between the mines and the places where the ore is to be used, and in these places are men whose design it is to organize forces that will oppose the operation of the selective draft.

We have these conditions to face. We, as a large body, I do not believe can possibly legislate in final detail how control over explosives should be exercised. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] stated a little while ago that he did not think this committee, sitting as a whole, or his committee could draft all of the precise features that this law should contain. He is correct in a large measure, but that is not the greatest difficulty. The greatest difficulty is that when once enacted that statute would have to be lived up to and could not be changed until Congress saw fit to change it. Under the bill the rules and regulations can be changed from time to time the better to fit conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and to which I assume there will be no objection, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," strike out the words "in time of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "while the United States is at."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order. I do not understand that that amendment is in order now.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to call attention to the amendment presented by the committee to section 1. Under this amendment, as I read it, no one can tell just what the court will determine is a violation of the statute. Each individual case must be submitted to the court to be determined whether or not this section has been violated. Under this amendment—and I do not have the exact language before me—if these explosives are used in such manner as may be detrimental to public safety, there is a violation of the section. Under the second section authority is given the President to promulgate such rules and regulations in the interest of public safety as he may deem to be necessary, covering the manufacture, and so forth. It occurs to me that the first section, which is the prohibition in this bill, should be clear, definite, and conclusive, the same as in any other penal law.

The gentleman from Arkansas representing the committee stated a while ago that with the amendment the section is complete. If the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is correct that there is no intent on the part of the committee that section 2 shall in any manner control the provisions of section 1, what is the use of having section 2 in the bill? What is the purpose of having section 2 if section 1, which is the prohibitory clause, is complete? Why should this Congress call upon the President of the United States to declare by proclamation in what manner these explosives may be manufactured or used? I submit that this committee by section 2 has attempted to do what it failed to do in section 1; that is, to define clearly what will be a violation of section 1. And it is expected that the President by a proclamation will state specifically what can and can not be done under section 1.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I am sure if the gentleman will read section 2 he will see that it does not anywhere authorize the President to say what may or may not be done, and especially with the amendment that has been offered. Section 2 will become an exemption, and not an extension at all, because section 2 will then provide that the President may provide for these rules and regulations for the manufacture for proper purposes of these different explosives, and then the proviso will be that it shall not be unlawful, nor shall it be held to be detrimental to the public safety if they are manufactured in accordance with these rules and regulations. Then, if a man were indicted and the Government should prove that the manner in which he manufactured it was detrimental to the public safety, and he should prove that he manufactured in accordance with the rules and regulations laid down by the President, under that specific provision he would not be liable. Would it not be a protection?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; but is it the intention of the committee that in construing section 1 the court will determine whether or not there has been a violation of the proclamation of the President? When a person is brought before the court for punishment for violating section 1 of the bill, I take it the proclamation of the President will be before the court, stating under what rules and regulations such explosives may be used. And I submit, that if one may be exempt by the court under a proclamation of the President, he may also be punished for the same reason.

I trust sections 3 and 4 will be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, this Congress can not afford to pass at this session or at any other session of Congress a law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

Our fathers thought so well of this freedom that they protected it by writing a provision into the Constitution of the United States in which it is stated that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." If there is to be a censorship, it should be of those things that concern the Government and not officials of the Government.

This espionage bill is an assault upon the most sacred rights of American citizens.

It is un-Democratic, un-Republican, and un-American.

If there is to be a censorship, I believe it should be applied first to certain officials of the Government.

In the next place, it is unnecessary. No person is so foolish as to claim that Berlin gets its information from our newspapers. The fact is, I believe Berlin knows more about what is going on in this country as regards our military operations than do many Members of Congress, and I am not criticizing Congress when I make that statement.

Berlin had no difficulty in finding out that our flotilla of destroyers was on its way to England, and they did not get it from the newspapers, either.

The officials say that it is leakage, but if that is true, then there is all the more reason why our officials should be careful.

Nothing was said about the departure of Gen. Joffre until he was safely landed in France. Nothing was said about the departure of Mr. Balfour until he was safely in Canada. Nothing was said about the departure of our flotilla until it had landed in England. Nothing will be said about our soldiers until they have landed in Europe.

But I venture the guess that Berlin knew all about these occurrences before the American public knew about them. I believe in the fullest publicity concerning the actions of all public officials.

I shall stand for the freedom of speech and of the press. If our Government does not give our soldiers the proper treatment, or does not use the public money to the best advantage, the people should have the right to criticize such conduct.

We should not destroy in this country what we are seeking to establish in Europe—liberty.

A Republic can not long endure without this freedom of speech and freedom to criticize, and all that freedom of the press and the freedom of speech means is the right to criticize public officials in the manner in which they conduct the offices they hold.

The concealment of military plans and operations is of course necessary, but that is up to the officials themselves. We may feel assured that when it once gets outside of the secrecy of the public official Berlin will know about it. If this bill is passed, officials might construe it to mean criticism of public officials and not criticism of the Government.

The acts and conduct of officials must always be subject to criticism, and when the time comes when we are forbidden by law to criticize our public officials then a republican form of government has ceased to exist.

The strongest argument against abridging the freedom of speech and the press is found in the President's war message, delivered to Congress last month.

Let me call your attention to a few extracts:

> The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty.

What is political liberty but the right to think, speak, and write what a citizen desires in criticism of the public acts of public officials?

Again, the President says:

> Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no man has the right to ask questions.

The President complains of the inability of the German to ask questions.

Again, the President says:

> But only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing.

He was referring to Germany.

But listen to what follows. Says the President in his message:

> They are unhappily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the Nation's affairs.

There are many other expressions in the President's speech which confirm my opinion as to the value and the necessity of freedom of speech and of the press even during war times. If I believed any abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press would hasten the end of this war I would favor it, but under no circumstances is that possible.

Let us fight this war like men. Let the people know those things they should know about the management of this war and the uses to which these billions of dollars we have appropriated are being put.

It is up to the officials of our Government to whet their wits against the wits of the enemy.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would at this time beg your pardon for intruding upon your patience if it were not for the fact that I am interested in this legislation and have made some slight investigation of the laws of the several countries as to regulating explosives.

There are in the United States 15 States with laws requiring the records of the sale of explosives. There are 13 States in the United States that do not require records of the sales but require some regulations as to the sale of explosives. There are 20 American States that have no law upon their statute books regulating this important subject.

Austria passed a law in 1877 and modified it in 1907. Belgium passed a law regulating the sale of explosives in 1881 and amended it in 1894. France passed a law in 1875 and amended it in 1892. Germany passed its law in 1874 and amended it in 1911. Great Britain passed a law in 1875 and amended it in 1905. Italy passed a law in 1895 and amended it in 1905.

Gentlemen, in my district we have a great many mines, the same as in the districts of some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill. The purpose of this bill is to regulate the handling of these explosives, and every man who has investigated the question has found that the crooks or yeggmen, as they are called, can take dynamite and extract from it nitroglycerin and use it as an explosive in their work of blowing safes throughout the country.

My objection to this bill is that it is only enforced during war times. I think the National Government ought to have a law regulating the sale of explosives in peace times, because we find to-day plots throughout the United States because of the fact that we have dealt too easily with the criminals of this country.

Now, in the other foreign nations they require a record——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to agree with the gentleman as to that proposition, but I would ask him whether this bill would provide for any such general protection in times of peace? It provides only for a proclamation, as I understand, and does not meet the suggestion the gentleman makes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes, sir. And I have some objections to the bill on that ground.

On April 19 I introduced in this House a bill—H. R. 3550—regulating the sale of explosives and putting it under the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, making it his duty. And I followed in that bill that most excellent law known as the Harrison Drug Act, in its general provisions; and, in my opinion, that bill would come nearer meeting the demands of the American people than the bill you have here. That bill was referred to Mr. McAdoo, and he returned it and said that on account of the great amount of work connected with the liberty loan he could not undertake to handle that bill. And they sent me the report on the bill the committee has now reported.

I feel, gentlemen, that this is too important legislation not to receive the serious consideration of this House, because it is far-reaching. In Italy a man who is found carrying explosives must explain and show where he bought the explosives, or he must make some showing. Now, if you have a bill that requires a record to be kept of purchases of explosives, the same as you do as to the purchase of drugs under the Harrison Drug Act, then when an explosion occurs in the United States the officers in the Department of Justice can run down the criminal and bring him to the bar of justice. Under present laws we have not sufficient means with which to bring a man to the bar of justice and prosecute him. I will support this bill, gentlemen, because it is along the lines I am urging. But I would like to say that I would have preferred to have supported a bill that would have placed this matter under the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and let the same officials and men who go out and investigate the violations of the Harrison Drug Act investigate under the regulations that you provide under this act. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say only a few words regarding the much-discussed war powers of the Constitution. I notice that the proponents of this bill base very largely the legislation contained in it upon the proposition that it is for the common defense and general welfare. I regret that because of the fact that the only power given to Congress is not the general power to legislate for the common defense and the general welfare, as seems to be commonly understood. Section 8 of the Constitution, in which that language occurs, is as follows:

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

And the Supreme Court of the United States and jurists have interpreted that to mean that the purpose of the common defense and general welfare used in this section refers only to the power to collect taxes and impose duties and imposts and excises for the common defense and the general welfare.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TOWNER. I am afraid that I can not yield, because I have only just a few moments, if the gentleman will pardon me. I am quite sure he will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to say that while that is true, there is no possible question but that Congress has ample power to legislate upon this question. I call the chairman's attention and the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that they have a far greater power and a far greater authority within the language of the Constitution when it says that Congress shall have power to declare war. If it has power to declare war it has power certainly to legislate in any way it chooses with regard to any of the necessary instruments of war. War can not be carried on without explosives, without ammunition, and for that purpose it is within the power of Congress to legislate as it chooses, almost, with regard to the regulation of explosives in time of war.

The Constitution gives Congress the power to raise and support armies. You can not support armies without providing them with ammunition. Under that power it would be possible for Congress to take away from all the private manufacturers of the United States the right to manufacture a pound of powder or explosives of any kind, and manufacture all its ammunition in its own arsenals. Or it could impose any conditions or restrictions it thought necessary and proper upon its manufacture by private persons or corporations.

Congress has a right to exercise any power regarding the management and control of explosives that they choose to exercise that may be proper and necessary for that purpose in this time of war.

Congress has the power to provide and maintain navies. It can not maintain a navy without explosives, and under that power of the Constitution there is abundant authority in Congress to legislate and provide for the regulation of all kinds of explosives. That is what is meant by the so-called war powers of the Constitution. There are no general war powers contained in the Constitution. There are no extra war powers in the Constitution, and we do not need them, because the power to declare war, the power to raise and support armies, the power to provide and maintain navies, contains all the war powers that may be necessary, because all of those things that are proper, that are legitimate, that are within the possible scope that may be determined by Congress in the exercise of carrying on these powers which are specifically granted are within the purview of the Constitution, which says that all the powers necessary to carry into execution the expressed powers granted shall be lodged with Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, when I first read this bill I did not see how I could support it. Since it came up for consideration this morning two amendments have been offered. The first, to section 1, strikes out part of line 5 and all of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, and inserts a provision that leaves section 1 a declaratory law. An amendment is also offered to section 2, but I am not satisfied yet with that section. I think it should be stricken from the bill, and I shall vote to strike it out.

I realize that a law covering the general subject matter should be enacted, and as I suggested here this morning, I wish the committee had prepared a law upon this subject. We ought not to give the power of making laws by proclamation to a coordinate branch of this Government. We are the lawmaking power, and we should assume the responsibility of making the laws, and make them specific and provide the punishment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It never was contemplated by the Constitution of the United States or under our form of Government that the President of the United States should have power to make proclamations which amount to penal statutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. If I recollect rightly, the pure food and drug act is the most conspicuous example of regulation. That was passed when the gentleman's party was in power.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not talking about parties now. I am standing here in the center aisle, speaking without partisanship.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, I will say that law was passed by the aid of the gentleman's vote.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is a very different thing from a proclamation of a penal statute.

Mr. BORLAND. The act defined certain crimes and made regulations covering them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was a law in itself and provided for the punishments to be imposed.

Mr. BORLAND. And it authorized the making of Executive orders.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There are no Executive orders that have the force of a criminal statute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman appreciates, of course, the fact that in time of war it is almost always the unexpected that happens, and in such times provision should be made to cover such things? It might be perfectly harmless in time of peace, but would in time of war be very harmful.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Even then the President of the United States ought not to be given authority to declare a penal statute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How would you meet that exigency when Congress was not in session?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I would keep Congress in session, and I would have Congress pass such specific laws as were needed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And you would make specific ex post facto laws when the horse had been stolen, and then you would lock the stable door. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The same thing would be applicable to proclamation. I believe we are still capable of maintaining a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. I do not believe it is necessary to convert this Republic into an Imperial Prussian Empire. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have not the slightest doubt that all the gentlemen here are anxious to help the administration to pass a law to regulate explosives. But this is not what we are asked to do. We are asked to enact three pages of law and attach an unlimited number of pages of blank paper, and then authorize the Bureau of Mines to fill in what the bureau may see fit to put in at the time.

I want to particularly appeal to gentlemen on this floor who are lawyers and ask them, After you go home and clients in your respective States write to you or come to you for information as to what they may do or may not do under this law, what would you say? You would say that we had enacted a law consisting of three pages of printed matter, but that you were not able for the life of you to tell any one of them what they might do or what they might not do under this law, for the simple reason that the law was not put in yet, but that, as a general proposition, you had enacted a law permitting some agency of the Executive of the United States to put in regulations.

Then you wait 30 days and the Executive issues his proclamation. What do you find in this bill? You find on page 2 that the Executive may change his mind, and after you have advised your clients what is the law it is not the law any more, because this is what it says on line 9, page 2:

> That the President may by proclamation from time to time make such alterations, modifications, and amendments to such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and which the public safety may require.

In other words, here you have a criminal statute for the violation of which your client may be sent to the penitentiary, and yet the statute itself says that from time to time it may be changed, so that maybe he is guilty of violating a criminal statute on Wednesday and perfectly innocent of violating it on Thursday, or vice versa. [Laughter.]

Now, I am willing to vote for legislation on this subject; but I do not believe that any set of men, not even the sacred Bureau of Mines, should be permitted to write criminal statutes on blank paper furnished by the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

The most dangerous feature in this entire bill is this: That it is not a piece of permanent legislation, even after the proclamation by the President has been promulgated. The very day after you have informed your client of the contents of the President's proclamation he may change it again, and there is no limit in this bill that it shall not be changed between congressional sessions. Gentlemen, I think that in its present condition this bill is a most dangerous piece of legislation. It is a criminal statute, with penitentiary sentences attached, and no one can tell what is a violation of the law and what is not. And I want to plead with the committee to bring in here to-morrow or the day after or any other day a definition of what it is that you want to prohibit, and I assure you that I will be glad to vote for it and help to pass it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the question of the power of Congress to enact legislation of this character is one of the most important that has ever come before any Congress, and while one can not in five minutes discuss that question with any degree of satisfaction either to the committee or to himself, inasmuch as it has been raised, I desire as well as I can within the five minutes to give my view of what this power is.

I agree with the decision in ex parte Milligan, quoted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], that the Constitution was made for war as well as for peace, and I do not agree that Congress has any police powers in time of war or in time of peace. Any power that we have to enact legislation of this sort must be founded upon the provisions of the Constitution itself, and in my judgment this legislation can be sustained upon the power to declare war.

The power to declare war carries with it of course implied powers. One of them is the power to prosecute that war, and that means to take all means necessary to prosecute it to a successful conclusion. And it means further that Congress has the power under that enumerated clause to enact any legislation the end of which is the successful prosecution of this war, and we may adopt any means that we see fit, provided the means that we adopt are plainly adapted to the successful carrying on of that war. Now, that does not mean that because we declare that a state of war exists we can put into a bill that in time of war such and such shall be the law. The provisions of the bill itself must be such that they are plainly connected with the successful carrying on of the war. Courts will inquire, and properly so, whether they have any connection. If the court can see that there is a connection, it will not inquire then whether the particular means employed was necessary or not. That is left to the judgment of Congress.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not in the five minutes I have. Upon the proposition I have just stated I want to quote just one paragraph from the leading case on this subject, that of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat.). This paragraph has perhaps been quoted more often than any other paragraph in any other decision of any court in the world. The court said:

> We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate—

In this case the successful carrying on of the war—

> let it be within the scope of the Constitution—

In other words, under the power to declare war—> and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

And that means, in my judgment, that provided the things we propose to do are directly connected with the prosecution of the war, we may then do anything we deem necessary that is not expressly prohibited by the Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have five minutes more, not to be taken out of the time. This is the most important point in this bill, and this is the most important thing in all this war legislation. I thought if the gentleman wanted five minutes——

Mr. MAPES. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as stated before there should be legislation in regard to explosives, but I wondered whether or not the committee have thoroughly thrashed out even the amendments as suggested. I want to read in my time section 1 as it will appear after it is amended.

> That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess powder, explosives, blasting supplies, or ingredients thereof, in such manner as to be detrimental to the public safety.

Now, I want to see the matter arranged so that it is specific; but it seems to me that if there is any provision that will be indefinite, this must mean that; and I want the serious attention of the chairman and the members of the committee. What act, what thing can be done that will not be detrimental to the public interest?

Mr. FOSTER. Some operative of a mine who does not properly protect the explosives that he keeps on hand in the mine. For instance, in the State of Illinois in an old, abandoned quarry they discovered where there was a lot of dynamite caps and dynamite located, and it was being stolen, and on looking it up they found that it belonged to some explosives company. They immediately notified that explosives company to take charge of that particular explosive located there. That is one thing they could do.

Mr. RAKER. That is true, but it is dangerous to leave such property, and I venture the opinion now that in every State in the Union anyone who leaves dangerous explosives in such a way that human lives are exposed is guilty of a crime beyond all question.

But that is not the feature involved here. Gentlemen who have spoken—and I am not going into that feature of it, because there can be no question that you have the power to pass this law. You have the power to enact a direct statute specifying what shall be unlawful, what shall be done, how they can transport it, how they can store it, how they can handle it, how they can manufacture it, how they shall buy it, and what receipts shall be given for the sale or the purchase.

Now, there can be no question that you have the power to make regulations if you have the power to pass a law. Section 2 leaves it entirely to the Executive order, a most important matter, without any designation of what shall be the offense, what shall be the punishment, and, as gentlemen have well said, we must pass the act, we must lock the door before the horse is stolen. How can the Executive order be any more effective than the statute?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in giving the consideration which the committee gave to this bill and to this particular amendment we had in view some of the very questions that have been raised here in the discussion of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House. We knew that there would be at once the question raised of the war power, because I do not believe in times of peace there is any power in Congress to legislate generally on the question of explosives. That constitutional power has been explained very clearly by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The other question that has been raised here is the question of the delegation of legislative power, and that question, I think, merits more consideration than the question of the war powers. We examined this question for two or three days, and finally determined that, under the decision in the case of the United States against Grimaude, found in the Two hundred and twentieth United States, page 506, the legislation was clearly justified under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. That is the case which came from California, where a man violated the regulations adopted by the Forestry Bureau of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. If that is the law, is there any reason why you can not enact a statute clearly covering the matter without leaving it to regulations?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. So far as the law is concerned, a statute could have been enacted embracing the regulations. The regulations could have been put in the bill, but the question whether we should do that or not was a question of whether it was wise to do it.

Mr. RAKER. Why was it not done?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We thought it not wise because in the time of war after Congress has adjourned and between that time and when it convenes again some emergency might arise and we thought that the power ought to be lodged in the Executive which would enable the Executive to handle the situation. I raised the question in the committee and insisted at first that these regulations should go into the bill. I said that I was not willing to subscribe to a favorable report on the bill which delegated to the President the power to say what should be the law and what should not, and I really think that this does do that in a way. Whenever you delegate the power to make regulations and say that a violation of those regulations shall subject one to a penalty, in a way the Executive makes the law. I said I was unwilling to subscribe to that. But later it was made clear to my mind that in this emergency, in this war time, we should have the power reposed in the President.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. From the gentleman's experience and the reasoning of the committee as to what might occur, can the gentleman conceive of anything that could happen but what could have been put in the bill under language that would have covered the whole subject?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think you can put general expressions in the bill and make violations thereof subject to penalties. Referring to the particular point made by the gentleman as to certainty, if the first section was not supplemented by the second section as proposed to be amended, I think the objection would be well taken. The second section of the bill makes it definite and certain just how a person may be free from a violation of the provisions of the bill. The reason that the first section is drawn as it is, is for the purpose of making it come within the decision of the United States against Grimaude, which contains this language:

> But when Congress had legislated and indicated its will, it could give to those who were to act under such general provisions "power to fill up the details" by the establishment of administrative rules and regulations, the violation of which could be punished by fine or imprisonment fixed by Congress, or by penalties fixed by Congress or measured by the injury done.

I think the first section and the second section make it clearly within the provisions in this case. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, in line 4, to strike out the word "smokeless."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "smokeless."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the desk, which I wish to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 1, line 3, after the word "to," insert the following: "injure or destroy by fire or by use of explosives, or by other violent means, or shall attempt to so injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utilities as herein defined."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. DYER. I think it is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, here is the proposition: This is a bill covering the manufacture and sale and possession of explosives, and attempting to regulate such sale, manufacture, and use of explosives. The gentleman undertakes to add another crime to the statute, and that is the proposition of injuring Government property, as I gather it, by the use of some of these explosives.

Mr. DYER. Oh, no; by fire.

Mr. WINGO. By fire? There is not anything in the bill with reference to incendiary fires or punishing anyone for that kind of an offense. It is not germane to the section nor to the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, this bill refers to nothing else than to regulations pertaining to the storing, and so forth, of war matériel. The amendment which I have offered provides for punishment also for the destruction of war matériel.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not want that statement to go into the RECORD. This bill does not undertake to regulate the storing of war matériel.

Mr. DYER. It provides that it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, and so forth, these various things.

Mr. WINGO. But it does not say war matériel.

Mr. DYER. Smokeless powder and explosives are war matériel.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but that is not the object of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. Ought not the word "and," in line 5, be stricken out and the word "or" substituted?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it ought to be.

Mr. WINGO. I differ with the two gentlemen, although they are better scholars than I. I think the word "and" is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then you must have the blasting supplies and material to make them out of.

Mr. WINGO. If you were drawing an indictment you would use the word "or," but the statute always carried the word "and"; that is, when you use the form of statute you use here. Where you start out and say that it shall be unlawful to do things, you use the word "and" instead of the word "or," because then you would have an alternative. No; I believe I am wrong, it is just the reverse.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will turn back to line 3 he will see that it reads in this way:

> That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute—
> And so forth—
> blasting supplies and ingredients thereof.

And in line 4 the expression is used, "store, use, or possess smokeless," and so forth. That is in the disjunctive, and I think in line 5 the word "and" should be "or," so that it would read "blasting supplies, or ingredients thereof."

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, there is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DOWELL: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," strike out the words "in time of" and insert the words "while the United States is at."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out the word "while" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "when."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. DOWELL: Strike out, on page 1, line 3, after the word "that," the words "in time of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "when the United States is at."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 4, page 1, by striking out the word "powder." You have already stricken out the word "smokeless" and the word "powder" there is meaningless now.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; there are many kinds of powder besides smokeless powder.

Mr. RAKER. And there is face powder.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reconsider the matter to which I directed his attention a moment ago.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman is right, on reconsideration, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "and," in line 5, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin moves to amend by striking out on page 1, line 5, the word "and," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CARAWAY having resumed the chair a message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 70. Joint resolution relating to the service of certain retired officers of the Army.

EXPLOSIVES.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon the passage of this act the President of the United States is authorized, empowered, and directed to prepare, make, and promulgate by public proclamation such rules and regulations in the interest of public safety as he may deem necessary governing the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, or possession for necessary and proper purposes in time of war, all such smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and the ingredients thereof: Provided, The President may by proclamation from time to time make such alterations, modifications, and amendments to such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and which the public safety may permit or require.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offered an amendment which is pending and which has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO offers the following amendment: Amend section 2, page 2, by inserting at the end of the section and as a part thereof the following:

"Provided further, That it shall not be deemed to be detrimental to the public safety and shall not be unlawful within the meaning of this act to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess smokeless powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and the ingredients thereof when the same shall be done in compliance with such rules and regulations."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the word "smokeless," so as to make it conform to the amendment already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment. The Clerk will report it as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out the word "smokeless" before the word "powder."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, on line 7, page 2, I move to strike out the word "smokeless."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAKER moves, on page 2, line 7, to strike out the word "smokeless."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 7, the words "in time of" and insert "when the United States is at"—the same amendment that was in the first section.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no objection to that, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOWELL offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "in time of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "when the United States is at."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 8, by striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or," so as to make it harmonious with the previous amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to amend, on page 2, line 8, by striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or."

Mr. WINGO. I want to submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that possibly this is not the same thing that we had to consider a while ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is not I will not insist on the amendment; but I think it is the same proposition.

Mr. WINGO. I will state to the gentleman I went over that just a few moments ago, and I came to the conclusion it is different. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: He is providing rules and regulations governing the manufacture and distribution of powder, explosives, blasting supplies "and the ingredients thereof," not "or the ingredients thereof." It is covering both.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is right. My purpose was merely to place the paragraph in harmony with the preceding paragraph. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention to his amendment. Whether or not he wants in line 2 to have it conform to the other by changing the word "and" to "or"?

Mr. WINGO. Yes. Next to the last line of the amendment I offered, the words "supplies and the ingredients thereof," the word "and" should be changed to "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Wingo amendment by striking out in the last line thereof the word "and" and inserting the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in order to carry out the provisions of this act and the directions contained therein, the Bureau of Mines, Department of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to employ such persons, without regard to civil-service requirements, and to utilize such agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof, and the District of Columbia, in the execution of this act, and all agents, agencies, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act when acting by the direction of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. MILLER of Minnesota, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, and Mr. MCKENZIE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is recognized.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McKENZIE offers the following amendment: Page 3, line 2, after the word "Mines," insert the following:

"Provided, That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917."

Mr. FOSTER. We have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, there probably will be some amendments offered here. May we agree on some time? I would like to get through with this bill, if possible to do so, to-night. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] before that amendment is offered, that in line 21 there is an error in the spelling of a word. It appears in the bill as "executon." It should be "execution." Without objection, the Clerk is authorized to amend it.

There was no objection.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LaGUARDIA offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 17, strike out the words "without regard to civil-service requirements" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883."

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offered a similar amendment yesterday to the food-survey bill, and I intend to offer a like amendment to every bill that comes before this House in which there is an effort to make appointments throughout this country without regard to the civil-service law.

Yesterday the steam roller was brought into play, and I did not have an opportunity to appeal from the decision of the Chair. You all remember what happened when my amendment was offered on yesterday. You remember the energetic use of the gavel by the Chair. I was choked off and prevented from taking an appeal. I feel that the Chair and the Democratic side of the House knew what would happen if that appeal was presented to the House.

A MEMBER. What would have happened? [Laughter.]

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Why, yesterday and the day before the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] made a passionate appeal to this House for the passage of the food-survey bill, urging unity and harmony, and stated it was necessary to take the food survey; that it ought to be carried on without loss of time. To do so, I take it, he would need the best men available. We offered a means to employ efficient and capable men through the medium of the Civil Service Commission. You will all agree that the Civil Service Commission, with its personnel, equipment, and its facilities, is better able to select capable men, and in less time, than the Secretary of Agriculture could possibly do it—assuming that he intends to make any sort of a selection. Oh, no; the chairman did not insist on unity and harmony then; he was contented to raise a point of order and have the amendment ruled out. And now, gentlemen, we will have 7,000 men roaming all over this country with the ostensible purpose of preaching about hog cholera and incidentally extolling the virtues of the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I regret I have not the time. I fail to see the consistency of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. If he is anxious to enact his bill into law and sincere in his motive, how could he refuse to take the best men available by selecting from a list of a competitive examination free from politics? I suppose we can not prevent you from creating jobs, but we do protest when you come before this House not only appealing to the patriotism of the Members of the House but appealing to their sentiment by exposing the empty stomachs of the American people, in order to jam through a bill containing 7,000 jobs and carrying an expenditure of $14,000,000. [Applause.] The people of this country believe that the food bill will bring relief. Yes; relief to the job hunters; but, in my opinion, it will bring nothing else.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Do you think the Civil Service ought to apply to the ladies that will be employed under the amendment offered by the lady from Montana, which was adopted yesterday?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes; and the ladies will be willing to stand for it; they will be able to qualify intellectually.

Mr. MILLER of Minneapolis. And they will all qualify?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes; some will qualify, the same as men. I would like to see these 7,000 experts who will go throughout the country distributing leaflets telling the farmers how to plant their soil. I am curious to know where they will be taken from.

Mr. WINGO. I have in mind a distinguished gentleman, a Republican in politics——

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Oh, a question only, please. I do not get a chance to have the floor very often.

Mr. WINGO. And the Bureau of Mines will utilize his services in case this law is passed in its present form, but will be unable to do so if the gentleman's amendment were adopted. The distinguished gentleman referred to is perfectly willing to go ahead and act under the authority of this bill if he is designated. Would the gentleman from New York try to shut that gentleman out?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Absolutely. Why not?

Mr. BUTLER. Would it not be better to dispense with the services of one man in order to save a public law?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes. You are putting this in to protect one Republican. Is that it? Yesterday you would not stand for my amendment, but choked me off in order to protect 7,000 Democrats. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. One object of this bill is to work in connection with the mining and factory inspectors. As I understand, that was the reason why this amendment was put in.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I understand that most of these people will be watchmen and inspectors.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; not only watchmen and inspectors.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. No matter what they are. You can select the men better able to do the work required by means of civil-service examination. A man may be a good Democrat and yet know very little about explosives.

I seriously urge the adoption of my amendment. It seems hardly fair to urge harmony and unity on these bills and in each carry a regiment of jobs with fat appropriations. [Applause.]

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the Hartford Daily Times, one of the leading newspapers of New England, under date of May 28, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the editorial referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the editorial referred to:

MAKING FEAR.

Certain Members of the Senate are said to be concerned, and a number of people outside the Senate are known to be concerned, over the extensive powers requested or demanded by the President in the present war crisis. He has obtained, or is obtaining, dictatorial control over many matters of public interest, including industry, agriculture, commerce, and transportation. Never before have we so extensively deputized what ordinarily rests in authority with the deliberative legislative body. Because it is unusual we are naturally a little apprehensive about it.

The times demand machinery for prompt and effective action in our conduct of the war, both as regards our course against our enemies and our domestic control. It is obvious that promptness and efficiency can not be secured through processes of argumentative discussion. The delay in Congress over the measure providing for the establishment of an army offers striking evidence of the weakness inevitable to such procedure. Conditions being abnormal, there is necessitated a departure from the governmental system which in ordinary times we find most compatible with the public welfare. Hence the investment of the Executive with powers much more sweeping that we ordinarily accept as tolerable.

We are permitting this delegation of authority with excellent grace because we have the national common sense to perceive the present necessity. Such apprehension as may exist arises from the suggestion that when the crisis has passed the powers may not find ready restoration to their normal possessors. It is intimated that this departure from our traditional processes may acquire something of permanency.

To develop real fear of this, however, requires an exaggerated nervous condition. Insistence upon the republican form of government is too much a part of each and every one of us to make usurpation possible even should the inclination exist. We are a sensible folk, choosing for the most part sensible public servants. We can not be oppressed by any one of our citizens, no matter what his post, because the other 999,999,999 of us are unalterably opposed to such a proceeding. We display sound conception of our present needs by taking steps to avoid the confusion and contradiction which so thwarted Abraham Lincoln at the start of the Civil War. It is hardly to be assumed we are silly enough to think that in so doing we are surrendering any portion of our liberties. If we must feel alarm in the premises, it must be lest the delegated authority be at some time faultily exercised. The perpetual avoidance of error is presumably impossible in any individual. But we may reasonably anticipate less of error through the operations of the indicated individual in the present case than we should obtain through the retarded decisions of our excellent Congress.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has offered an amendment taking these employees out from the civil service.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to read this statement that appears in the hearings when a question was asked by Mr. JAMES, of Michigan. I read:

Mr. JAMES. On page 2, line 14, you provide:
"And for the purposes of this act the Director of the Bureau of Mines is hereby authorized and empowered to employ persons without regard to civil-service requirements or to contributions to their salaries from sources other than the Government of the United States."
Is that so you can work in connection with mine inspectors and factory inspectors?
Mr. MANNING. Yes. You know Congress has passed a law forbidding that, but it does not affect the Bureau of Mines, because our organic act provides that we may take in people who are engaged in private industries and pay them a nominal compensation. I have particular reference to the discussion that appeared in Congress with regard to the Bureau of Education. For instance, we might want to take in State inspectors; it might be necessary to have those men to carry on this propaganda in many communities, and we would pay them a nominal sum, say, $1, $10, or $100, a nominal compensation, in addition to that which they were receiving from the State. These words are inserted in order to take care of certain legislation which now exists.

I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that the Bureau of Mines now has this very provision in their law, and it is done for that particular purpose. This is not intended to give any Democrat or any other partizan politican a job. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is in order to efficiently carry out this provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state if it is the same as the law we passed yesterday?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know anything about the law we passed yesterday, but I do know that this need exists in the minds of the officials in the Bureau of Mines, and it is absolutely necessary, if the bureau is to be administered efficiently, that this provision should remain in this law.

Now, let me say this to my friend, that these men are not going to take the civil-service examination, and the Bureau of Mines would be constantly hampered in doing their work if this was not in the law. But this very provision is now in the law affecting the Bureau of Mines; and I want to submit to my friend from New York that it is fair and right that it should be there. This is only for temporary employment, if at all—very few men.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman state any work that these employees will be called upon to do?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; they may be called upon to make certain investigations in reference to explosives. They may have materials submitted to the Bureau of Mines, which is equipped to make examinations of that kind. They might want to call in some experts, and yet be unable to do so if this provision goes into the bill.

Mr. JAMES. On that point I asked Mr. Manning this question in the committee hearing:

Up in our mining district we have mine inspectors, elective officers; you expect to cooperate with them?
Mr. MANNING. Yes, sir. We expect, Mr. JAMES, to cooperate with everybody that we can get.
Mr. JAMES. In my own county we have one mine inspector and three deputies, and those men are in the mines every day.
Mr. MANNING. They are State officers?
Mr. JAMES. They are county officers.
Mr. MANNING. They are considered as State officials. We will have to utilize all those officers.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my friend from New York that I do not care about any job. I do not get any, anyhow. But I will say this provision ought to go into the law, and that it will require more officials than it would not to do this. Now, as I say, unless we put in this provision they could not utilize these men without going and having a civil-service examination. They would be precluded from doing it. And yet, if this is permitted to remain in there, there will be very few new people who will have to be employed under this bill—scarcely any, I should say—because they can utilize them in the way suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, why is the sum of $250,000 asked for?

Mr. FOSTER. That is to pay general expenses. I do not know whether it will require that amount or not. It is simply authorized, that they can go up to that amount. I will say to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that this does not provide an appropriation. The Committee on Mines and Mining is not an appropriations committee. Since I have been on this committee we have never brought in a bill providing an appropriation. I do not think it is right that a committee which is not given the power to report appropriations should do that. I think that duty belongs to the Appropriations Committee. Let the Bureau of Mines or the Secretary of the Interior, or whoever it may be, come in and make a showing that they need that much money. They can not go beyond the amount authorized in this bill, but the Appropriations Committee, of which my honored colleague [Mr. CANNON] here is a member, can appropriate any necessary amount up to $250,000. We do not make any appropriations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill does authorize an appropriation. I was going to ask if in any one of the preceding mining bills provision had been made for an appropriation?

Mr. FOSTER. Provision for an appropriation has been made in a mining bill, but none has ever been made that is left to the proper committee to appropriate. You will remember that we passed through the House the bill providing for the establishment of mine rescue stations and experimental stations. That bill did not carry one cent of appropriation. It simply provided for the establishment of those stations in a certain way, and the matter of providing the necessary money for their establishment was left entirely to the Appropriations Committee, where I think it ought to be, and I have specially avoided bringing in appropriations on these bills.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Section 4 of this bill authorizes an appropriation of $250,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That it may be appropriated. Now, if the Committee on Appropriations after a hearing decide that they do not need more than $10,000, they will give them $10,000, and that is all right. They can go before the Appropriations Committee and say what they need, anything within this amount of $250,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman in all fairness that the question has been raised that the Committee on Mines and Mining has no power to make appropriations.

Mr. FOSTER. No; they have not, and yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania has seen committees that had no appropriating power bring in bills authorizing appropriations, but we have never done that. And I want to say to my friend from Pennsylvania that so long as I am a member of that committee—and I think the committee as it is now constituted will never bring in a bill providing that an appropriation shall be made; but we have done the fair thing to the House. I think the right thing, as far as the House is concerned, is to let the Appropriations Committee take up this matter and look into it and decide the amount of money that is necessary, and if they need only a thousand dollars the Appropriations Committee can recommend that amount.

Mr. BORLAND. If that is true, section 4 is not needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A question has been raised as to whether a point of order would not lie against section 4.

Mr. BORLAND. Section 4 is not needed, for the authorization of law is contained in section 3 and section 2. The Appropriations Committee on proper hearing is bound to provide according to the estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true.

Mr. BORLAND. Then section 4 ought to go out.

Mr. FOSTER. I simply state that the authorization was made. Now, if the appropriation can be made in a deficiency bill, that might be done. I do not know. But in all my dealings with the Committee on Appropriations I have never found it amiss in doing what Congress authorized it to do. In the bill establishing the Bureau of Mines I was criticized because we did not provide an appropriation to carry on the mining interests. I said to them at the time that I had faith in the Committee on Appropriations being big and broad enough to do what Congress had specified should be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it is necessary to keep section 4 in the bill? If he has to go to the Committee on Appropriations anyhow, why raise the question in this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee undertakes to say that $250,000 ought to be spent, but that is as far as it goes.

Mr. FOSTER. Up to that amount.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The committee acknowledges that it has no authority to make an appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. No; we could have brought in a bill appropriating $250,000, and I think it would have been in order, but the committee has been fair, and we said we will not do that, we will leave it to the Committee on Appropriations. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA and Mr. LENROOT) there were—yeas 14, nays 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is to strike out section 3. The language of the section is involved and admits of complications that even the committee will admit exists. It is proposed in sections preceding to give the President authority to issue a proclamation which shall include rules and regulations that are to take on the effect of law with regard to the use of explosives. The President is given all the power that is needed, apparently, in the first paragraph and the second section of the bill. Section 3 involves a lot of machinery which would doubtless be invoked in the proclamation. For instance, the Bureau of Mines, with the approval of the President, is to employ such persons without regard to the Civil Service and utilize such agencies and "all officers of the United States" and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities thereof, and all officers of the United States and of the several States, and so forth. That is a field so wide that it is difficult to comprehend just what it means.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that the intention of the bureau was to do this: For instance, to take the mine officers, the mine inspectors, and the commissioners and sheriffs of counties and employ these agencies with the Federal Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would not that be covered by the President's proclamation?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I think not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the State of Pennsylvania we have a system for the inspection of mines and all the machinery that this paragraph refers to. Would that be placed under the direction of the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. No; they would work in cooperation with the Bureau of Mines. It would be a sort of welding together of the local machinery with that of the Federal machinery.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And our State, I assume, would gladly cooperate at the suggestion of the President.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the proclamation of the President would do it; I think the section is necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell us what "such agencies" refers to?

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say that we have a commission which carries into effect the national law in regard to the transportation of explosives—one of the best bureaus there is anywhere. The Government would expect to cooperate along with that bureau, too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to be a grouping up under the direction of the Bureau of Mines, when the President once authorizes it, of all the existing machinery of the various States—"and all agencies and all officers of the United States and of the several States, Territories, subdivisions, and municipalities"—it seems that everything you desire to be done could be done under the regulations of the President declared by proclamation and that section 3 is unnecessary.

I call attention to lines 23 and 24, and while the language, I think, is not clear down to that point, it is proposed in lines 23 and 24 to utilize the subdivisions of the municipalities, and so forth, which "shall have full authority for all acts done by them in execution of this act when performed by direction of the Bureau of Mines." "For all acts" they are to have full authority. Now, some one might order a man to be shot. Is "full authority" given for that? It does not say lawful acts. You propose to cover "all acts."

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am willing to have an amendment to carry out what was intended in the paragraph, and that is that there shall be a cooperation by all agents in trying to prevent the illegal use of explosives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is fair, as he always is. But suppose there should be a riot at a mine, resulting from conscription or something of that kind, and these "agencies" that are to have "full authority" for "all acts" done, should fire into a mass of men?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that relates to this at all; I think the draft law would have nothing to do with this.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or misunderstandings as to work and wages. That would be an act sanctioned by this paragraph, if authorized by the Bureau of Mines. It does not say "lawful acts." All acts are to be excused under this language.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to some features of paragraph 3 which manifestly ought to be changed. For instance, this bill gives the President of the United States certain powers, imposing upon him certain duties, and then, in section 3, it gives the Bureau of Mines authority to employ persons for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act. We are giving the President the authority to act; we are directing him to act; and then we are telling a subordinate agency of the Government that it shall have authority and may appoint persons to do the work.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am just coming to what I think the gentleman is going to say—with the consent of the President.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That gives the President the right to veto, but it ought to give him the right in the beginning to initiate. If the President wants to delegate some of his authority, that can be done, perhaps. If he wants to appoint certain agencies in the administration to perform certain duties, he can do so under the bill; but the bill ought to give the President the power to appoint these men and not some subordinate branch of the Government.

When my time was exhausted a few minutes ago I had not quite completed that which I really desired to say. I think the exigencies that do exist in the mining centers of the country require some legislation, require some authority of this character. I believe that we should give to the President authority to regulate and control the manufacture and use of explosives, although it may be necessary that we give him authority to regulate and control certain individuals who use explosives who do not need any regulation and who should be left alone. In other words, to enable him to reach the evil it may be necessary to confer upon him authority which I trust he will not exercise, or in the exercise of which I trust he will give the highest and first consideration to the needs of those industries. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG], a member of the committee, was exceedingly full of foresight and wisdom. He, being a member of the committee, took occasion to pledge the Bureau of Mines that it would not enact any rules and regulations until he had viséed them and submitted them to the industries in his district to have them O. K'd. That may be all right for his district, but it does not suit mine at all, unless it be that the O. K.ing which his district gives may meet any objections that may come from the district that I represent. I trust that in the making of these rules and regulations the utmost care and circumspection will be exercised, and that it shall not be left to the Bureau of Mines and a committee of this House, but that there shall be consulted, not only the miners who use the explosives but the mining operatives throughout the country, in order that the rules and regulations will not be subversive of the best interests of the country.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it is somewhat preposterous to ask us to pass legislation with the assurance that the regulations that are to be adopted thereunder will be submitted to a particular committee of the House to be passed on by them?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is wholly improper and not justified by any procedure, and it would be a dangerous precedent ever to establish. Mr. Chairman, if I might proceed in the moment or two that I have left, I very much prefer this bill without the amendment which the committee has adopted by changing the first and second sections. I believe we should give power to the President to make certain rules and regulations. I think we should put in an affirmative statute that it is unlawful to commit any act in contravention of those. The whole position has been changed around by the amendment. In other words, we say that if a man manufactures or stores or has in his possession dynamite it is up to the Government to prove before it can convict him of any offense that his manufacture or possession thereof is contrary to the interest of the public defense, which will defeat in most instances the very terms of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this motion to strike out section 3 will prevail. It ought to prevail both upon its merits and to make more secure the validity of the bill as it will be finally enacted into law. It must be remembered that whatever power we have to enact this legislation is under what is termed the war power, and if this legislation is to be sustained it will not be sustained simply because there is language here that says it shall be effective in time of war, but it will be sustained because the court, looking at this legislation as a whole will be able to say that it has a direct connection with the prosecution of the war, and therefore is within the power of Congress. But let section 3 remain in the bill, and what interpretation is likely to follow? Why, you put the duty upon the Bureau of Mines to enforce this act. What has the Bureau of Mines to do with the conduct of this war? You do not even permit the President to initiate the enforcement of the act. We have three departments of the Government that have to do with the carrying on of this war—the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Department of Justice—and the President is Commander in Chief of all three of them, and yet if section 3 remains in the bill a division of a department of the Government which has nothing whatever to do with war is charged with the enforcement of this act, which is termed a war measure. If this is a war measure, and sections 1 and 2 I admit, properly limited and restricted, are within our power, then its enforcement should lie with one of the departments of the Government that have to do with the subject of war, and the one that is specifically in charge, so far as the objects of this legislation are concerned, is the Department of Justice.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman will recall that I stated this morning that I was not especially wedded to these two next sections, but this has occurred to me in the light of what the gentleman has said. I do not believe it is susceptible of the construction that the gentleman puts upon it, that the power to enforce the act is delegated to the Bureau of Mines. There is delegated to the Bureau of Mines only the authority to employ persons in the execution of the act. That is all that is delegated to the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. LENROOT. Then if that be so, that authority is delegated to a department that has nothing to do with the conduct of the war.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further. Coming down to the merits of this proposition, this legislation is proper and necessary in connection with the Department of Justice. For instance, their special agent finds a man whom it is suspicious of having an intent to use explosives for blowing up some building or doing some injury.

If he finds that that man has an explosive in his possession for which he can not give a good account, then he is the one who should report it back to the Department of Justice, whose duty it is to prosecute under this penal statute. What has the Bureau of Mines to do with the enforcement of a penal statute of the United States? To whom will they report? Report to nobody except the Department of Justice, if at all, and surely it should be the special agents of the Department of Justice who should be employed. And there is ample authority under the law that we now have for employment of special agents of the Department of Justice to secure information looking toward prosecutions or violations of this penal statute. And I want to say that if there should be any attempt under the guise of the war power to enact legislation of this character, not for the purpose of successfully carrying on the war but for the purpose, however meritorious it may be in the public interest, to protect mines and individuals and the stealing of explosives and things of that kind, it can not be sustained under this legislation. If we want this legislation sustained, it should be clear upon its face that we do propose to confine it to the prosecution of the war, and you can not so do if you leave sections 3 and 4 in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I believe that there is one minute remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] claims that this should be placed under the Department of Justice. I suggest that the gentleman has not made any effort to turn the internal revenue over to the Department of Justice. The gentleman can not show in this provision any reason why it can not be done in this case as it is done in the case of violations of the internal-revenue laws. What would be done would be to turn over to the district attorneys of the Department of Justice any violation of the law, where it belongs.

Then there is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why it should be placed in the Bureau of Mines. It is because there is an organized bureau which has to do with explosives, and it either ought to go there or to the War Department. But after suggestion from the War Department and the other departments of the Government it was suggested because they had this organized bureau in the Department of the Interior that this law should be executed through that department.

Why, do you know, the Department of Justice does not deal with coal mining? It does not deal with explosives used in coal mining; but here is a bureau with all its workings confined practically to that department of the Government and its activities throughout the United States. And I say to you that the only place where it ought to be lodged is in the Bureau of Mines, in order that it may be properly taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to strike out section 3.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 30.

Mr. FOSTER. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. FOSTER and Mr. LENROOT to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and including supplies, equipment, expenses of traveling and subsistence, and the purchase and hire of horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will accept that, as long as the other section has gone out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LENROOT moves to strike out section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin wish to discuss it?

Mr. LENROOT. I am willing to vote on it without discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well, then; I will discuss it.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only two minutes and say this, that now that section 3 is stricken out there is no possible excuse for section 4 remaining, unless you desire to appropriate money in the District of Columbia for the purchase of automobiles. [Applause.] That is all I have got to say on the section.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Ordinarily he discusses things on their merits, and that is one of the qualities that has made me have such a great admiration for him.

The committee has stricken out section 3, and the gentleman from Wisconsin urges that as a reason why we should strike out section 4. I am always frank, and I do not care anything about section 4. Personally it does not please me, but as a member of the committee I recognize that from its viewpoint section 4 ought to stay, especially since you have cut out section 3, and I will tell you why. You could let section 3 stay in and then cut out section 4; but now that you have cut out section 3, the President is going to be compelled to appoint a lot of new men. Why? Under section 3, if it had remained in the bill, we would have authorized the Bureau of Mines, with the approval of the President, to use the police of the different States, the sheriffs of the different counties, and all the other local agencies in the different States, so as to save the expense, and that was the sole purpose that was had in mind when we wrote that provision in the bill, to avoid the necessity of appointing a lot of Federal employees, to try to save the people from being annoyed by a lot of Federal employees running around over the country; to save not only money but to save as far as possible local administration and local enforcement of the law. But gentlemen who stood up here and offered objections to the bill to the effect that it was a violation of State rights were the first ones to go through the tellers and vote to kill section 3, which provided for services of local and State police officials. They talked one way and then voted the other way when the time came to act.

What you should have done, gentlemen, was to have allowed section 3 to remain in the bill and then strike out section 4. I could possibly see the common sense of that course. But by striking out the only provision, the only single provision giving the President the power to appoint any agencies or to pay those agencies you absolutely kill the law, and you leave it simply as a statute on the books. These things differ from ordinary crimes. Do you expect the agents of the Department of Justice throughout the country to enforce this law and locate the people who are trying to violate the law? If you do not use these local agencies, you are bound to have some Federal agencies appointed who will do this work.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I can not. Well, I will, although the gentleman when he spoke did not discuss the merits.

Mr. LENROOT. Has not the Committee on Appropriations full authority to recommend that there be given to the Department of Justice whatever is necessary?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, yes; the Department of Justice has a lot of agents now looking after the business of the United States falling under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. Does the gentleman mean to say that all the employees that are necessary to enforce the internal-revenue laws shall be appointed also by the Department of Justice?

Mr. LENROOT. Not under a statute like this.

Mr. WINGO. I think not. I think it is very necessary to keep this matter in the control of the Bureau of Mines. The Bureau of Mines is in direct control of and in touch with those agencies that use from 80 to 90 per cent of the explosives that are affected by this bill. This is a common-sense business proposition. This work ought to go to the Bureau of Mines. What does the Department of Justice and its different employees know about the use of explosives? What does the Department of Justice know about the voluntary cooperation of the railroads and the mines and miners and the munition manufacturers, who now are working under agreement with the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of trying to prevent the unlawful use of explosives? They have no knowledge whatever of the subject. Yet the Bureau of Mines, without any particular authority of law, has, through its own organization, cooperated with the various activities I have named throughout the country, and if this section had remained in the bill they had intended to use the agencies authorized by section 3 so as to give the people the protection of the law and carry out the provisions of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I can see no reason on earth why the President of the United States, under the authority contained in the first and second paragraphs of this bill, can not utilize every local official in the United States to carry out the provisions of the act.

Further, Mr. Chairman, I can see no reason on earth why the Department of Justice should not be given the full authority to do these specific things, using the agencies particularly belonging to the Government. I know that the Department of Justice now has men in the iron-mining regions and elsewhere who are doing the specific thing that this bill is trying to accomplish.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman know that they are appointed by the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And with an appropriation from the Committee on Appropriations that personnel can be enlarged. I can see no reason on earth why we should not strike out section 4, unless it is desired that we spend $250,000 in the District of Columbia for some automobiles.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out section 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, in line 16, page 3, I move to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

Mr. RAKER. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 3, line 16, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUDDLESTON offers the following amendment: Page 3, line 13, after the word "act," strike out the balance of line 13, line 14, and the words "this act" in line 15.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, well, there is no use in the committee going back on their own bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I wish to discuss the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] had kept up with the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, he would see that this is a very proper amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, as this bill now stands it punishes by fine or imprisonment those who may violate any regulation which the President may adopt with reference to this bill; and, as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has well said, the amendment should be agreed to, in order to be consonant with the amendment adopted at the beginning.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered entirely emasculates the bill. You either want to strike out the enacting clause or else vote down this amendment. There is not any question about that. The only provision of the act that makes it penal is the rules and regulations promulgated by the President, and if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] will listen to me I want to call his attention to this amendment. If it is agreed to you might as well strike out the enacting clause of your bill.

Mr. WINGO. I think not, if the gentleman is addressing his remarks to me.

Mr. RAKER. I am. I call the gentleman's attention to it.

Mr. WINGO. I have not been deceived by the amendments that have been adopted. Perhaps the gentleman has. I recognize that by the amendments which have been adopted the bill has been completely reversed, and it is entirely different from the plan that the committee originally reported.

Mr. RAKER. Why, no. Under section 2 the President shall promulgate rules and regulations, and those rules and regulations are what make it effective. As provided in section 1 it is unlawful for one to have these things in his possession, but there is no penalty provided in the bill, neither fine nor imprisonment.

A MEMBER. Section 5.

Mr. RAKER. Section 5 does not strike out this provision, because it simply says——

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not understand. As I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, section 5, if adopted, will read as follows:

That any person or corporation who violates the provisions of this act shall upon conviction thereof be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than three years, or both.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to this fact: The rules and regulations that are to be promulgated under this act are the ones that are to be effective, are they not?

Mr. WINGO. The rules and regulations, as I explained to the gentleman when I was on the floor, constitute a protection and an exemption. The law, for a violation of which the offender is to be punished, is provided by section 1 as amended and not by the administrative rules that the President is directed to make.

Mr. RAKER. I am going to read section 1 as it will read:

That in time of war it shall be unlawful to manufacture, distribute, store, use, or possess powder, explosives, etc., in a manner detrimental to the public safety.

Then it says, in section 2:

That upon the passage of this act the President of the United States is authorized, empowered, and directed to prepare, make, and promulgate by public proclamation such rules and regulations in the interest of public safety as he may deem necessary governing the manufacture and distribution, storage, use, or possession for necessary or proper purposes in time of war all such powder, explosives, blasting supplies, and the ingredients thereof.

Now, you strike out the provision of the bill that makes it an offense to violate these rules and regulations. You have no law to say what it is. There is no designation as to what it is, what the storage shall be, what the shipment shall be, who shall hold it, and how he shall keep it or use it; and you then provide no penalty for the violation of these rules and regulations. But that bill is as absolutely worthless as a scrap of waste paper with this stricken out, and that is evidently the purpose and intent of this amendment. Either defeat the bill and be consistent or vote down this amendment and make it effective. That is all.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this amendment will not prevail. I share the views expressed by the gentleman who just addressed the committee [Mr. RAKER] that to strike out this part of this section would make the bill meaningless. This bill has followed other bills which contain similar provisions. It provides for two things. One is the expression of the legislative will of Congress, and the other is a delegation of the power to make rules and regulations. All of these acts containing similar provisions, when it comes to the part of the bill providing for the penalty, have a provision that the person who violates the provisions of the act or the rules and regulations shall be subjected to the penalty. If the gentleman is right in his contention that it is surplusage to put it in, then it can do no harm to leave it in. In my opinion to strike out that portion of it would make meaningless the part that provides for rules and regulations, and I sincerely hope that the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think this language ought to be left in the bill, and I hope that the committee will vote down the amendment

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOUSTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3932) relating to the manufacture, storage, etc., of explosives and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin striking out section 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] demands a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin striking out section 3. Is there a demand for a separate vote on any other amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote on any other amendment.

The other amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this matter may go over until Thursday and be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LENROOT. I think we had better dispose of this tonight.

Mr. FOSTER. There will probably be a roll call.

Mr. LENROOT. Not unless the gentleman asks for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. FOSTER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. If the House adjourns now, will this matter come up on Thursday morning?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the previous question having been ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MCANDREWS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were 49 yeas and 39 noes.

So the motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Thursday, May 31, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV,

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination for canal from Silver Springs to Ocala, Fla., of such width and depth as will meet the demands of commerce (H. Doc. No. 160); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 31, 1917.

Right Rev. Julius W. Atwood, D. D., of Phoenix, Ariz., bishop of Arizona, offered the following prayer:

God of all power and might, the Maker and Ruler of men, we commend our Nation and the Members of this Senate to the guidance of Thy wisdom, to the keeping of Thy love. May the rulers whom Thy people choose to serve them serve Thee in honesty of purpose and uprightness of life. May they never forget their answerableness to the people whom they serve and to that people's God. Bless them in their ministry with an ever larger vision of truth, an ever deeper sense of the demands of righteousness, that through their faithfulness the life of our people may be guided by wise policies and lifted to higher ideals and nobler achievements.

And listen to us, our Heavenly Father, as we join once more in the prayer Thy Son taught his disciples to pray: Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last, when, on request of Mr. BRADY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY (S. DOC. NO. 38).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to an estimate of appropriation transmitted on the 3d instant for an increase of the force in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1918, $31,940, and which has not as yet been provided for, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The telegram is as follows:

LOS ANGELES, CAL., May 28, 1917.

Honorable GENTLEMEN OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

I have invented guns, bomb throwers, shells, and other devices which fire the guns and operate automatically against torpedoes, shells, or ball fire from enemies when they strike near them. My invention applies to all kinds of guns and firearms. It is at your command. Drawings can be examined here.

ROBERT LEE WRIGHT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a petition of the County Carlow Society of New York (Inc.), which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The petition is as follows:

COUNTY CARLOW SOCIETY OF NEW YORK (INC.),
New York, N. Y., May 17, 1917.

Whereas the Constitutional Party in Ireland has fought for more than 40 years to secure self-government;

Whereas the British Government, after trying every means within its grasp to stifle that movement, was compelled at last to bow to the wishes of the people, and passed a modified measure of local autonomy;

Whereas an insignificant but pampered minority in the northeast of Ulster induced the Government, under threats of physical force, to suspend the said act and promise in addition before putting it in force an amendment which will practically destroy the limited powers of the Irish Parliament;

Whereas the British Government once more has broken faith with the Irish people: Be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the County Carlow Society (Inc.), of the city of New York, all loyal and patriotic Americans, proclaim our belief that England will never do justice to Ireland unless compelled by some outside force. We are of the opinion America is now in a favorable position to exercise that force to compel England to make good her promises in reference to small nationalities held in subjection by a foreign foe. She is the foreign foe and Ireland is the oppressed small nation; be it

Resolved, That no settlement short of absolute independence will satisfy the aspirations of the Irish people.

THOMAS C. HENNESSY, President.
JOHN WILKINSON, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from A. D. Pentz, of New York City, N. Y., which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The letter is as follows:

THE SANTISEPTIC MANUFACTURING CO.,
New York, May 29, 1917.

HON. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having read and heard that several submarines have been located and captured by observing the actions of sea gulls, the following idea for locating submerged submarines has presented itself to me:

This being a fact, should friendly submarines be sent to sea each day to scatter food while submerged, awash, and while running, the sea gulls would be educated very quickly to follow the undersea boats, expecting to find food.

The passage of a law forbidding the disposal of refuse from all other boats while within the areas of submarine activity would whet the appetite of the "aerial police dogs."

From personal observation of these birds the indications are that they will very quickly learn to recognize and follow their new and only source of obtaining food.

The expectant following gulls thus become a telltale to the immediate vicinity of your quarry.

Any means at hand to be used to destroy or capture the unsuspecting submerged submarine.

With this means the U-boats could be located and cut off at or near their northerly base, thus keeping the southerly shipping lanes free of their menace.

Remember that sea gulls are always on hand with but one object in life—food—which they must have or die. Their eyesight enables them to follow the scent in the water as a bloodhound follows a scent on land, with the advantage that the gull can not be foiled by its quarry taking to water.

Very truly, yours, A. D. PENTZ, D. D. S.

"CHAPTER 68.

"Assembly joint resolution No. 13 (by Mr. Frank F. Merriam, of the seventieth district) relative to the sale of the ripe pine in the national forest reserves, located in the State of California, and the use of the proceeds in the construction of dams and reservoirs for the collecting, impounding, and conserving the waters of the State and the protection of its lands from flood waters.

"Whereas it is estimated there are many millions feet of 'ripe' and merchantable pine timber in the national forest reserves located within the State of California, most of said timber being of excellent quality and conveniently located for manufacturing and commercial purposes; and

"Whereas this timber is a ripe product, and its utilization is most desirable in the interest of providing protection to, and development of, the young and growing timber in these forests; and

"Whereas most of the source watersheds of our stream systems are included within the area of said national forest reserves and a large percentage of the sites desirable for reservoirs for the collection and storage of flood waters are within the boundaries of these same national forest reserves: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That we memorialize the Government of the United States to arrange for the sale of the 'ripe' pine in the national forest reserves located within the State of California and the application of the funds (above the 25 per cent now given to the road and school funds of the State) received from such sources to the building of dams and reservoirs for collecting, impounding, and conserving the waters of the State and the protection of its lands from floods; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California be requested to use their influence to bring about the results above outlined; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to forward a copy of this resolution to the respective Houses in Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California, including those who assumed office March 4, 1917.

"ARTHUR H. BREED,
"President pro tempore of the Senate.
"MARTIN C. MADSEN,

And do hereby certify that the same was duly filed with the secretary of State on May 4, 1917.

B. O. BOOTHBY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a joint resolution from the Legislature of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE, AT SACRAMENTO,
FORTY-SECOND SESSION,
ASSEMBLY CHAMBER, April 24, 1917.

To the honorable Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Senators and Members of Congress from California:

In compliance with the provisions of assembly joint resolution No. 23, adopted by the Legislature of the State of California at the forty-second session, I am sending you a true copy thereof, in title and words as follows:

"CHAPTER 75.

"Assembly joint resolution No. 23 (by Mr. J. A. Pettis, of the sixth district), relative to providing as expeditiously as possible a fairer and more adequate compensation for those engaged in active service in the Army and Navy of the United States:

"Whereas in this hour of grave necessity many of our brothers are called upon to leave their usual employments and professions and enter upon the service of our country; and

"Whereas the offering of themselves for such service entails much sacrifice and real material loss; and

"Whereas the compensation allowed the American soldier even in times of war is inadequate and insufficient to meet his ordinary needs when in service, or to permit him to contribute toward the care and comfort of those dependent upon him whose burden of suffering and deprivation is his greatest concern; and

"Whereas some relief of the existing conditions would have a tendency to strengthen, encourage, and sustain the soldier in the discharge of his duty and his dependents in their great sacrifices; and

"Whereas those loyal Americans not engaged in active service should be willing to lighten the burden of the soldier and take upon themselves some part of patriotic sacrifice: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the assembly and senate, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California does hereby most respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to provide as expeditiously as possible a fairer and more adequate compensation for those engaged in active service in the Army and Navy of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, directed to send a certified copy of the resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present a petition from citizens of St. Petersburg, Fla., and vicinity which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. The petition contains 256 signatures, and prays for the immediate enactment of prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors as a measure of food conservation.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States.

The undersigned earnestly petition for the immediate enactment of prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors as a measure of food conservation and for the immediate prohibition of liquors for beverage purposes in order to conserve the health, wealth, labor, transport facilities, and military efficiency of the people.

R. A. CARNINE
(And many others).

Mr. POMERENE. I present resolutions passed by the Central Ohio Osteopathic Society, at Columbus, Ohio, May 26, 1917, tendering their services to the Government as a hospital corps to an osteopathic base hospital to be hereinafter supplied to each division of the Army. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions passed by the Central Ohio Osteopathic Society, Columbus, Ohio, May 26, 1917.

Whereas the science of osteopathy is recognized by legal statutes in 44 States of the Union, giving them the right to call themselves physicians and surgeons and to practice their method of manipulative surgery called osteopathy; and

Whereas the Government of the United States has not as yet given to the osteopathic physicians any legal standing; and

Whereas at the present time vast numbers of our citizens are constantly using the method of treatment known as osteopathy for their bodily ills, but should any of these citizens become soldiers they would necessarily be dictated to as to the kind of treatment they would have to take by the dominant school of medicine in the Army and Navy; and

Whereas most of the systems in the different departments of the Government are being changed or thrown away for the better and more modern methods of efficiency: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the Central Ohio Osteopathic Society, in special meeting assembled May 26, 1917, do hereby tender our services to the Government of the United States as a hospital corps to an osteopathic base hospital to be hereinafter supplied to each division of the Army. These base hospitals, wherever situated, to be connected with general hospitals. The equipment of such hospitals to be in conformity with that of the hospitals which are at the present time being run in connection with the different schools of osteopathy throughout the country, and the treatment given in such hospitals shall conform to the methods of osteopathy as taught and practiced in the recognized schools of osteopathy; and be it further

Resolved, That on account of the prejudice existing in the different schools of medicine that some legislation be enacted to give osteopathic physicians the same rank, pay, and allowance as physicians of other schools of the healing art. The educational standards being equal (practically the same subjects, except therapeutics) osteopathic physicians should have equal rank, the efficiency of osteopathic methods during war having been already proven on the European battle fields.

I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Nebraska in regular session assembled, That we respectfully and earnestly memoralize Congress to amend the Federal income-tax law and the rules and regulations of administration thereunder, to the end that all secrecy and privacy guaranteed to said income reports be removed and repealed, and that collectors of internal revenue of the several States and districts be required by law to file a copy of the said income reports annually with the secretary of the State board of equalization and assessment, or any other taxation or revenue officer having State-wide jurisdiction, of the State of which each individual making such Federal income-tax report is a resident.

MATTES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the economical and conserving use of food supplies.

Whereas in the present world crisis the economical and conserving use of food supplies is a highly patriotic and broadly humanitarian duty; and

Whereas the present standard of milling wheat into white flour diverts more than a quarter of the wheat from use as human food; and

Whereas the adoption of a high standard for milling wheat would be equal to increasing the supply of wheat by nearly 100,000,000 bushels: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature does urge upon the Congress of the United States that it take such action as may be necessary to conserve the supply of wheat by requiring a high milling standard.

That copies of this resolution, duly attested by the presiding officers and chief clerks of the assembly and senate, be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Wisconsin.

Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact a law vesting power in an appointive commission to regulate and control the production, distribution, transportation, and price of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities.

Whereas control of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities is essential to the welfare of our country and people, and the prompt enactment of appropriate legislation to accomplish this end is necessary for success in the present war and for the safety and preservation of our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact at once a thoroughgoing law that will vest in a commission to be appointed by the President, appropriate power to regulate and control the production, distribution, transportation, and price of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the chief clerk of the senate to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and also to the Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MARTIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cape Charles, Va., praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of intoxicating liquor from foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have a telegram from Meridian, Miss., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. I want to say, however, that if alcoholic liquors are to be manufactured from grain that ought to be used in this emergency for food I am very much in favor of taxing the liquors, and I should tax them as highly as it is possible to induce Congress to levy the tax. If I had my way in such circumstances I should tax them to the point of prohibition.

I think the idea of Congress permitting the use of grain for the manufacture of alcoholic liquors—grain needed for food—in order to get revenue for the support of the Government is very unwise. It is transforming an article that is essential or necessary to the preservation of life into something that actually destroys life. Permitting the use of grain for this purpose at this time is, in my judgment, simply monstrous. I concur fully with the people of Meridian, who adopted this resolution, that it is the duty of Congress to enact prohibitory laws and stop the manufacture of the damnable stuff altogether.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The telegram reads as follows:

MERIDIAN, MISS., May 30, 1917.

The UNITED STATES SENATE,
Care Senator James K. Vardaman, Washington, D. C.:

By unanimous vote, a meeting of about 700 citizens, representing all Evangelical churches of this city, earnestly oppose any increase of tax on alcoholic beverages or the destruction of food products in the manufacture of such liquors, and petition Congress by all constitutional means to establish national prohibition at least during the period of the war, and that this petition be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, as we all know, a mission composed of distinguished representatives of the Italian Government is in the city, and in order that they may come on the floor of the Senate and Senators may have an opportunity to be introduced to them I move that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

The Prince of Udine was seated on the right of the Vice President and Count di Cellere upon his left.

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, it will perhaps rejoice you hereafter to remember that within a very few days you have had the honor and pleasure of participating in three great historic scenes. For myself, I may say that I am very glad the distinguished visitors and myself both belong to posterity rather than to ancestry, for I have a historic recollection that some 1900 years ago the ancestors of these distinguished gentlemen were pursuing through the islands of Britain my ancestors, clad in sheepskin.

I am glad that I have lived in a time when the eagles of the Senate and the people of Rome come in peace to visit the American eagle in the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

History sometimes reverses itself and sometimes repeats itself. When Rome stood exclusively for power and sought to bring the habitable globe under her control she never quite succeeded in conquering the Belgian people. Nineteen hundred years after that failure the Roman people have concluded that what Rome as the representative of power could not do no other representative of power shall ever be permitted to do. [Applause.]

History repeats itself in another instance. When I was trying to ascertain the history of this great people, digging it out of the original, I learned, as I pronounce it in the Hoosier vulgate, that one of the great Romans closed each of his addresses in the Roman Senate with this remarkable statement: "Ceterum censeo Carthaginem esse delendam." History, I hope, again repeats itself in that the people of the seven-hilled city beside the yellow Tiber have resolved that for themselves and for humanity the house of Hapsburg must be destroyed. [Loud applause.]

It is my honor and my pleasure to present to you the representative of the people of Italy, the Prince of Udine. [Loud applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRINCE OF UDINE

The PRINCE OF UDINE. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, I consider it a great honor for the mission of His Majesty, the King of Italy, to be welcomed by the American Senate; it is also a great honor for me, and a source of deep satisfaction, to greet you on behalf of my country and to speak in this glorious assembly, which has never forgotten the noble traditions of democracy and the principles of liberty, in the name of which it was constituted.

In this hour of danger, in which military absolutism is threatening everyone, there are nations that have forgotten old and new competitions, and have united to defeat this menace to the common safety. We are in a more fortunate position. Between the United States of America and Italy there has never been any cause of conflict. Therefore, in your history and in ours there is no page which should be forgotten in this hour of brotherhood. In our present alliance we need not forget any war, nor any rivalry, nor any strife. If nothing brings men closer together than to fight for the same ideals, and to face the sufferings and the dangers of a great war, for the cause of justice and of humanity, we must acknowledge that this new and closer union means for us a greater bond of sympathy and solidarity in addition to those which already linked us.

This long friendship without strife, this union without mistrust, this cloudless future, are enhanced by the fact that both our peoples are at war, not because of any imminent danger that threatened us but to defend the same ideals of humanity and justice. [Applause.]

Nearly three years have elapsed since Europe, without any justifying motive, perhaps without any motive at all, beyond the will of a small military oligarchy, was driven into the greatest conflict which human history records. The struggle has extended beyond Europe, and now, a great part of humanity is suffering the anguish of a war which it did not desire and in which it did not believe. So much wealth, the fruit of long labor and suffering, has been destroyed; so many noble lives, for which the future held bright hopes, have been cut off before their time, that we can not bear to think of this spectacle of destruction without profound grief.

But a deeper anguish is stirring our souls. That which has grieved us more than the wealth destroyed, more than the lives cut off in the flower of their youth, is the sight of cultivated and intelligent nations, who, but yesterday, shared with us all a communion of life and intellect, who have now denied those principles of humanity and of justice which were the result of long centuries of work and the great and difficult conquest of civilization.

Little nations, which were entirely guiltless and which, within their small territory, contained masterpieces of art and treasures of industry, have been barbarously sacrificed.

In the conquered countries personal slavery has returned as in the worst periods of medieval invasions.

You know what methods have been introduced into submarine warfare, how nothing has been respected, neither neutral vessels, nor Red Cross ships, nor inoffensive travelers, nor women and children, who, even in times which we consider barbarous, enjoyed protection and safety.

In the enemy's camp science has perhaps sought to justify all these excesses. Will the human conscience ever be able to justify them?

Your wars have been fought for independence and for liberty, and your heroes have been men such as George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln—human heroes, shining lights of the intellect, who looked with a kindly heart even upon their adversaries. [Applause.]

We, too, after having suffered greatly at the hands of foreign oppressors, have conquered liberty and independence; and our heroes, the men who gathered around Victor Emanuel II, and gave Italy unity and freedom, were men such as Cavour, Garibaldi, Mazzini, champions of idealism, men who belonged to humanity rather than to their own country, pure glories of the world's democracy. [Applause.]

In your wars and in ours an ideal light has guided us, and our efforts were all directed toward a most noble aim. What ideals did those who have brought so much suffering upon the world aim at outside the dominion of force and the triumph of violence?

Gentlemen of the Senate, for nearly three years our continent has been involved in this great struggle, and it looked with anxious eyes toward your great and free country. We knew that the European war had increased your trade and given new vigor to your industries. Many feared that because of the ocean that divides us the great cry of grief of oppressed Belgium would only sound faintly in your ears; many feared that, absorbed by the activities of industry and labor, you would fail to take an interest in our struggle and in our sorrows. We, however, looked toward you with trusting sympathy; we felt that the great fatherland of liberty, the noble democracy which offered its hospitality to all the peoples of Europe, without distinction of race, of religion, or of languages, and granted to all of them the protection of the same just and humane laws, could not remain indifferent. [Applause.]

Nevertheless, we awaited your decision with anxiety, and it seemed to us that the holiness of our cause was in need of recognition by those who from afar would judge us with more serenity.

You waited to intervene until violence and offenses against right had become clearer and more evident.

When your flag, the stars of which, growing in number symbolize the growing prosperity of America and the triumphs of American labor—when your flag, always universally respected, was insulted, you hesitated no longer, and your mighty accents of promise and of faith rang in our ears. [Applause.]

Your Nation has colonized immense territories; it has created powerful industries; it has developed an ever-growing trade. You bring all the enthusiasm of your national youth to science and to labor. Our enemies are aware that you will bring into the war, which is flooding Europe with blood and making the earth barren, the invaluable strength of your men and of your wealth.

For this most noble adherence to our cause, given without any thought of conquest or of material wealth, we shall always be grateful to you. [Applause.]

But, gentlemen of the Senate, you bring us to-day something which is far greater than the help of men, of wealth, or of food; you bring us the sacred recognition of our right; you bring us moral confidence and the conviction—nay, rather the faith—that our cause is holy and that the free democracies, and even the greatest among them, share our feelings, our spirit, and our hopes.

How greatly the knowledge of your approval has helped us I need not tell you, who are strong men, who did not hesitate to enter into the whirlpool of war, and who preferred the hard way of duty to a comfortable and resigned indifference. [Applause.]

The message of your President, as our sovereign has said, is worthy, by the nobility of its conceptions and the dignity of its form, to rank with the most inspiring pages in the history of ancient and immortal Rome. [Applause.] It was greeted with the enthusiasm of faith when it made clear the objects of the war and defined the aims of American action. Our soldiers, at the foot of the snowy Alps, amid the atrocious life of underground trenches; our sailors, defying the treacherous warfare of the submarines, the populations of France and of Belgium, suffering under the most cruel servitude, could not read it without a profound emotion.

By proclaiming that right is more precious than peace; that autocratic governments, supported by the force of arms, are a menace to civilization; by affirming the necessity of guaranteeing the safety of the world's democracies; by proclaiming the right of small nations to live and to prosper, America has now, through the action of her President, acquired a title of merit which history will never forget. [Applause.]

You decided to take part in the war not by a sudden impulse but after having seen its full extent and measured all its horrors. And though you were able to choose freely between the tranquillity of a peace resigned to evil and the pain of a participation, which will require at your hands sacrifices of wealth and of lives, you did not hesitate. All this we appreciate very deeply, and every effort of yours to shorten the war will be blessed by millions of human creatures, victims of the greatest barbarity. [Applause.]

The increase of material wealth, the marvels of industry, the progress of science, all these are as nothing, if their aim be not the moral elevation of mankind.

There are sorrows which elevate men more than any joys; sacrifices which ennoble more than any successes.

By our sacrifices we must prepare the way for a humanity in which collective violence shall no longer be possible, and in the bosom of which each nation may freely unfold its activity and realize that social justice which is the Divine goal to which we are all tending, each in his own way. [Applause.]

Italy, gentlemen of the Senate, entered into the war with aims equal to those which you pursue. Her territory had not been invaded, her insecure boundaries had not been violated. Our people understood that the sacrifice of free nations was the prelude to their own sacrifice, and that we could not remain indifferent without denying the very reasons of our existence. [Applause.]

Italy has suffered more than any other nation in Europe the horror of foreign domination, the martyrdom of invasion and pillage; and, therefore, she will never forget the principles which presided over her birth and which constitute her strength and her defense.

Italy wants the safety of her boundaries and her coasts, and she wants to secure herself against new aggressions. Italy wants to deliver from long-standing martyrdom populations of Italian race and language that have been persecuted implacably, and are nevertheless prouder than ever of their Italian nationality. [Applause.]

But Italy has not been and never will be an element of discord in Europe; and as she willed her own free national existence at the cost of any sacrifice, so she will contribute with all her strength to the free existence and development of other nations.

By increasing the ruthlessness of submarine warfare and thus rendering navigation unsafe and dangerous, our enemies, who were not able to defeat our soldiers by the force of arms, hope to win the war by increasing misery and suffering. They hope that our powerful ally, Great Britain, will lack food; that France will lack food and men; and that Italy will lack especially food, and that which is more necessary, coal for the war, for industries, and for railways. The problem of shipping is for all of us the greatest problem of the war.

With our united efforts we shall vanquish all these difficulties; and that which the force of arms, secretly prepared and unexpectedly employed, was not able to accomplish will not be accomplished by disloyal means on land and water. We shall triumph over all these difficulties if we continue our efforts in brotherly agreement, united by the great duty which we have now voluntarily taken upon us for a cause which is superior to all worldly interests and which partakes of an almost divine nobility. [Applause.]

The mission of which I have the honor to be the head and in which there are representatives of the Senate of the Kingdom, of the Chamber of Deputies, and members of the Government, desires to express through me the liveliest sympathy to the representatives of the American people. [Applause.]

May God protect our two nations! Italy, which has given the world three civilizations, considers herself worthily at your side in this hour, full of sorrow it is true, but also great because of its moral nobility. [Applause.] A day will come when we shall be proud of our suffering and when our sacrifices will be rewarded. Let us endeavor, gentlemen, to bring that day nearer which shall put an end to the sorrows of so many who are suffering and dying without guilt. Let us hasten its coming, worthy representatives of the American people, by our firm will to obtain the victory and by our complete solidarity of ideals, of sacrifices, and of deeds. [Applause.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Prince of Udine and the members of the Italian mission will be gratified to meet the Members of the United States Senate.

The members of the Italian mission took their places at the left of the Vice President's desk, and the Members of the Senate were presented to them by the committee appointed by the Vice President.

The distinguished visitors were escorted from the Chamber; and at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., upon the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. Mr. FALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PROTECTION OF MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer a resolution, which I ask may first be read and then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 76) was read as follows:

Whereas four months of unrestricted ruthless submarine warfare since the 1st day of February, 1917, have demonstrated: First, that it is impossible to build merchant ships as rapidly as such ships are being sunk; second, that food products available for shipment are so very much below the normal that the sinking of any considerable quantity would make it impossible for our allies to continue their warfare; and

Whereas it has been often reported in the press of the country that inventions and mechanical contrivances which would protect or shield merchant vessels from torpedoes used by submarines have been perfected: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether any such device has been invented or constructed; and if so, why it has not been utilized; and also to report what facilities, if any, have been accorded by the Navy Department for investigating or testing any devices proposed for such purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just a word on the resolution.

When I brought this matter before the Senate some four weeks ago, I was informed by the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that the question of defending ships against the submarine torpedo was being considered; that the Government had practically found a full and complete defense against the torpedo and that in a very short time there would be nothing more to the submarine problem. Since that time we have seen in the press eveery few days reports to the effect that some one has discovered some new method of protecting merchant ships against the submarine torpedo.

I have not been misled by those statements any more than I have been misled by the assurance given by the acting chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SWANSON] that a remedy had been secured. On the contrary, Mr. President, I know that the Department is not giving the proper consideration to the subject of protecting the ship against the torpedo; that nearly all of its efforts have been along the line of discovering new methods of destroying the submarine, and little or no attention has been given to the subject of the protection of ships. I should like to get an assurance along that line, as to exactly what they are doing for the protection of merchant vessels.

I ask that the clipping which I send to the desk from the Post of this morning, which presents the situation again to the American people, may be read by the Secretary and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Thursday, May 31, 1917.]

TWO HUNDRED AMERICAN DESTROYERS NEEDED TO CURB THE SUBMARINE MENACE—"SITUATION IS GETTING OUT OF HAND," WRITES UNITED STATES OFFICER IN BRITISH WATERS; PUBLIC FED ON LIES, HE SAYS—FEW SUBMERSIBLES BEING DESTROYED.

NEW YORK, May 30.

Two hundred American destroyers are needed in British waters to curb the submarine menace. The submarine situation is so serious that the truth is being kept from the public. More ships are being sunk monthly than can be replaced.

These declarations were contained in a letter sent by a United States naval officer now in British waters to Judge Townsend Scudder, of Brooklyn. The letter was dated May 5 and the writer is a personal friend of the jurist. The judge gave the letter out for publication to-day, but withheld the name of the writer. The letter says:

GETTING OUT OF CONTROL.

"MY DEAR JUDGE: I am taking the liberty of writing to you in order that, knowing the truth, you may be able to remedy the evil. A number of destroyers arrived in port yesterday after a 10 days' trip. This proves that the boats of this type can cross; it had never been attempted before.

"What I am writing to you about is this: The situation is really getting out of control. The American public has been fed on lies for so long that it will be doubly difficult to impress it with the facts. The simple facts of increasing danger and importance are—

"First. More ships are sunk per month than can possibly be replaced in the same interval of time.

"Second. An insignificant number of submarines is being destroyed.

"Third. Not one-tenth as many have been accounted for to date as we have been led to believe. A hundred American seagoing destroyers operating from this side may hold the situation in check long enough to enable the allied army to drive the Germans from France and Belgium. If the United States does not immediately embark on the construction of at least 100, or preferably 200, destroyers, then it will have only itself to blame for the handwriting on the wall.

SITUATION IS MORE SERIOUS.

"It is already too plain. I can not write in detail. The letter would not get through. The situation is so serious that I am writing to you directly to tell you how things stand and to urge you not to believe the reassuring statements brought back by publishers and writers.

"I am where the submarine is operating most extensively, and for us the cards are now on the table. The American public must be scared into a realization of the truth if its present isolation prevents temporarily the growth of the patriotic impulse."

Mr. BRADY. I read this article in the Post this morning——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand that unanimous consent was asked to adopt the resolution?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I asked that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I so understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words relative to this matter. It was printed in the RECORD by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KENYON. I am going to ask for the regular order because the Agricultural bill has been before us for a long time, and the Senator knows how necessary it is to get some action upon it. However, I do not wish to interfere if the Senator is just going to take a minute or two.

Mr. BRADY. I am not going to discuss it, but if the Senator desires to have the regular order proceeded with and to have the matter read go into the RECORD without any remarks relative to it, I am willing to take that course. I am about as much interested in the Agricultural bill as any other Member of the Senate, and I have endeavored to have it receive proper consideration both in the committee and in the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I withdraw my request for the regular order.

Mr. BRADY. I simply want relative to this matter to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he knows who is the distinguished judge who presents this letter that was published?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say that I do not. It is simply a publication that comes through the general channels, and I assume that it is as authentic as the great majority of publications coming through the same source.

Mr. BRADY. I am perfectly willing to accord that privilege to the majority of publications of a similar character that come to the Senate, but this communication comes to the Senate unsigned, and the judge who gave the interview to the papers declines to give the name of the officer of the Navy who furnished the information. It seems to me it is time that we were giving more thought to the preparation of the defense of our country than to unsigned communications. I notice that the communication——

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senator if he does not consider it a subject matter of defense to this country when the whole subject is submarine warfare?

Mr. BRADY. I certainly do consider it a matter of defense to this country, but I believe that the department has a right to receive fair consideration at the hands of the Members of the Senate. I believe the department is doing everything that it can do to stop the terrible destruction of ships by submarines, and as long as they are doing that I believe it is only fair and equitable that we should give them a chance. This party says that we need 200 destroyers. Two hundred destroyers against the German fleet would not amount to anything.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator to give the date of the letter which was read? The date of the letter has not been given, I understand. Does the article show the date of the letter?

Mr. BRADY. It was received in New York and given to the press May 30. The letter may have been written long before our fleet got there.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the date of the letter is not given?

Mr. BRADY. I observe that the date is stated to be May 5.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought it would be well enough to understand the date.

Mr. BRADY. May 5 is the date of the letter written to the judge which was given out for publication.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with Judge Scudder, to whom the letter is addressed. He resides in Brooklyn and is a member of the supreme court of our State. He was formerly a Member of the House of Representatives. I am certain that the letter was sent to him, and I am inclined to think I know the officer, who is a relative of the judge. He received the letter; there is no question of that; and as far as his responsibility is concerned there is no question of it.

Mr. BRADY. I do not doubt that in the least; I believe he gave it to the press with the very best of intentions, but, on the other hand, I do not believe the Senate or the American people should become hysterical or expect to subdue the German submarines in 30 days. I do not believe what any unsigned statement that comes before the public may have in the way of force will scare the American people into action more energetic or aggressive than they are now performing. I notice this article says:

> The American public must be scared into a realization of the truth if its present isolation prevents temporarily the growth of the patriotic impulse.

I do not believe the American people have to be scared into patriotic impulses. I believe that every citizen of this Government who is a loyal citizen is just as anxious as it is possible to be to conduct the war in a manner that will win a victory. That can not be done, nor will it be done, if we are divided among ourselves. What I believe we should do is to get all the information we can get relative to U boats and place sufficient power in the hands of the proper man to take whatever action is necessary, and give them a fair trial before we try to make the American people believe that they are not doing the best they can. For that reason I believe that an unsigned article of this character should have no particular influence on the minds of the Members of this body.

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM G. M'ADOO (S. DOC. NO. 40).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, at a meeting of the business men and bankers at Des Moines, Iowa, May 21, 1917, on the liberty loan may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

MILITARY AND NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 39).

Mr. MARTIN. I submit the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 11, 13, 19, 20, 40, 41, 42, 44, 45, 50, 54, 55, 65, 66, 75, and 76.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7, 8, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 46, 47, 48, 49, 52, 53, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 67, 71, 72, 73, 74, 77, 79, 81, and 84; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

"For expenses of experimental work and investigations undertaken by the Council of National Defense, employment of experts, and at rates of compensation authorized by section 167 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of clerical and other assistance, supplies, including books of reference and periodicals, and for necessary expenses of members of the council, of the advisory commission, or subordinate bodies going to and attending meetings of the commission or subordinate bodies, $500,000: Provided, That of the appropriations herein and heretofore made for the Council of National Defense there may be expended for rental of quarters in the District of Columbia not to exceed $25,000 in the aggregate for the fiscal year 1917 and not to exceed $50,000 for the fiscal year 1918: Provided further, That in the expenditure of said moneys the existence of a state of war shall not be construed as enlarging the powers or duties of the Council of National Defense, but that such powers and duties shall remain as prescribed by the act creating said council, approved August 29, 1916."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "$500,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for personal services"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 57, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the following: ", $50,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Hospital construction: For temporary hospital construction, $1,000,000; and for the establishment of naval medical supply depots at Brooklyn, N. Y., and Mare Island, Cal., by purchase or construction, $350,000; in all, $1,350,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "that"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$20,408,161"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 43, 51, 68, 80, 82, 83, 85, 86, and 87.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, the morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4188, being calendar No. 59.

Before formally making the motion, I wish to say that House bill 4188 is substantially Senate bill 2344, which the Senate has had under consideration during the last four or five days. It would greatly facilitate the legislation to lay the Senate bill aside and proceed to the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that we first perfect the Senate bill.

Mr. GORE. If I may be permitted to say so, when the House bill is taken up I shall then move to agree to the amendments to the House bill which the Committee on Agriculture has recommended, corresponding to those already agreed to by the Senate. That will meet the point made by the Senator and, I think, will contribute to clearness in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator, Did the bill pass the House as it was reported to the Senate by the Senate committee?

Mr. GORE. You mean the last report?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as the committee reported it to the Senate?

Mr. GORE. The committee has recommended substantially the same amendments that it recommended to the Senate bill. I will move that the Senate agree to the amendments presented by the committee to the House bill which have already been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion that can be done better by perfecting the Senate bill and then taking up the House bill and striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the Senate bill. But I shall not take any time of the Senate, and we can proceed in the way suggested. We will save time by not talking about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What the Senator from Oklahoma is trying to do is what the Senator from Utah desires to have done.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4188.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? No objection is heard.

Mr. GORE. First, in order to simplify the procedure, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment recommended on page 6, line 21, be disagreed to. It was disagreed to on Tuesday after the committee had submitted its report.

Mr. SMOOT. What bill is the Senator talking about?

Mr. GORE. House bill 4188.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment on page 6, line 21?

Mr. GORE. On page 6, line 21. That is the amendment that was disagreed to on Tuesday. The committee had already made its report at that time. Now I ask the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment out of deference to the expressed will of the Senate on Tuesday.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, having the two bills before me, when a matter of that kind comes up it is hard to follow it. I can not see how the Secretary is going to make the changes now that are asked.

Mr. GORE. I will state the procedure which I have in mind. The committee recommended an appropriation of four and a half million dollars for demonstration work. The Senate cut it down to $3,000,000. The Senate disagreed to the committee amendment on Tuesday. The committee recommended the same amendment before the Senate took that action. In order to conform the bill to the expressed will of the Senate, I ask the Senate to disagree to this committee amendment. Then I will move that all the other amendments agreed to by the Senate to the other bill be agreed to with respect to this bill. After that is done we can proceed with the consideration of new amendments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I trust the Senator will not attempt to patch up the bill in that way. I think after we have done away with the formal reading of the bill, which is in fact the House bill, we ought to go on in the regular way, paragraph by paragraph, and not begin at the back and work forward.

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will consider a moment, I think he will not make that point. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry recommended the sum of four and a half million dollars, and the Senate reduced it to $3,000,000. Now, I want the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand.

Mr. GORE. After that is done, then we can agree to the amendments to the pending bill, which have already been agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand what the Senator desires, but I think we ought to go through with the bill properly in the legislative form and not begin taking up amendments in a disorganized and irregular way. I think the bill should be proceeded with in the usual way.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from Oklahoma simply desires to proceed with the bill in proper form and I believe, following the suggestion the chairman of the committee made, in a very few moments we can do that. The appropriation on page 6, line 21, I understand will be $3,000,000 instead of $4,500,000.

Mr. GORE. The committee recommended $4,500,000 but the Senate disagreed to it on Tuesday by a record vote of two to one, and I see no reason why we should not disagree to the committee amendment to begin with. That eliminates it from the bill and will simplify instead of confusing its consideration.

Mr. BRADY. The bill will be subject to amendment.

Mr. GORE. It will be subject to amendment, of course. I do not see any reason why the Senate should give consideration to each one of the amendments already acted upon and agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that the House provision, to which he refers, carries only $4,348,400 and the proposal of the Senate committee was $4,500,000. Does the Senator intend to correct that so as to correspond with the amendment which in reality was adopted by the Senate?

Mr. GORE. It would, of course, be subject to amendment to do that after we agree to the committee amendment. I want to eliminate the committee amendment now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is the difficulty about it.

Mr. GORE. There is no difficulty at all about it. The Senate disagreed to this committee amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator simply wants to make it correspond to the action of the Senate?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator does not make it correspond to the action of the Senate by simply disagreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. GORE. The Senator perhaps did not understand me. I said I intended to follow this motion by a motion that we agree to the amendments which already have been agreed to where they are identical with respect to the Senate bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely want to call attention to that because I should like to see it correspond with the action of the Senate.

Mr. BRADY. The matter can be settled in a very few moments by disagreeing to this amendment. Then we can insert the other amendment, and in that way the bill can be perfected very easily.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if he will not ask now to have the bill read for action on the committee amendments and let us get at the bill in that way?

Mr. KENYON. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma to do that. We would save time by adopting that course.

Mr. GORE. If that will contribute to the understanding of Senators, I have no objection. My purpose was to save time.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a very long bill.

Mr. GORE. I want Senators to have a full understanding of the situation and appreciate that my purpose was to abbreviate time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the request?

Mr. GORE. That the bill be read for the consideration of the committee amendments and that we thrash over all the old straw again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that request will be granted.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it the House bill that is to be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill.

Mr. FALL. I have no objection if that is the sense of the Senate. It seems to me that we should proceed with our own bill and then substitute it for the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the enacting clause, the committee propose to strike out the remainder of section 1 in the following words:

That, for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of the food supply, by regulating the distribution thereof, and by such other means and methods as are hereinafter provided, the powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 1, to strike out "SEC. 2," and, after the word "agriculture," to insert "with the approval of the President," so as to read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of, foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, to strike out:

For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture, and his agents duly authorized therefor, may compel the attendance of witnesses, the giving of testimony, oral or in writing, under oath or otherwise, the production of books, letters, papers, or documents, and the submission of reports; may sign, issue, and serve subpœnas; and may enter, on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises in which products enumerated in this section are stored or held. Any person who, in violation of any requirement made pursuant to this section, willfully fails or refuses to obey any subpœna, to answer any question, or to submit any book, letter, paper, document, or report, or knowingly makes any false or misleading answer or report, or willfully conceals or withholds any information, or any person who willfully obstructs or hinders the Secretary of Agriculture or any of his duly authorized agents in the performance of any duty under this section, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both. Witnesses summoned in pursuance of this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States: Provided, That no witness subpœnaed under this section shall be obliged to attend for a greater distance than 300 miles from his residence or place of business: Provided, That in the enforcement of the provisions of this section the Secretary of Agriculture shall not engage for compensation, actual or nominal, the services of any person or persons who have been associated with corporations or associations that have been dissolved for violation of the antitrust laws.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

It shall be the duty of any person, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any agent acting under his instructions, to answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all questions necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section. Any person who shall willfully give answers that are false shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after "SEC." on page 3, line 23, to strike out "3" and insert "2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 1, after the word "grow," to strike out the words "or otherwise procure"; in line 2, after the word "them," to strike out the words "by sale"; and in line 3, after the word "farmers," to strike out the words "on credit or other terms" and insert "for cash," so as to read:

SEC. 2. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that there is or may be a special need in any restricted area for seeds suitable for the production of food or food crops, he is authorized to purchase, grow such seeds, to store them, and to furnish them to farmers for cash, at cost, including the expense of packing and transportation.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if the word "grow" should not be stricken out before the words "or otherwise procure"?

Mr. GORE. That word should be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 4, after the word "transportation," to strike out all down to and including line 4, on page 5, in the following words:

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seeds, except the producer thereof, to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture in such quantities, at such times, and at such price as shall be determined by him to be reasonable. Upon failure of the person to comply with such requirement the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to requisition and take possession of such seeds and to pay for them at the price so determined. If the price so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid for such seeds on delivery or seizure the amount prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation for such seeds, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies.

Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with furnishing seeds to farmers under this section may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to change the numbering of the two following sections.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 5, line 21, after the words "duplication of," to strike out "effort or funds" and to insert "work."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 22, to change the number of the section from "7" to "6."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 3, to change the number of the section from "8" to "7."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 6, line 12, after the word "act," to strike out "$5,778,000" and insert "$2,500,- 000, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918," so as to read:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 3 of this act, $2,500,000, and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one moment. I want to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if that amendment, which is found in the House bill, was adopted by the Senate? In other words, was this amendment, which contains the words "and this fund may be used as a revolving fund until June 30, 1918," adopted by the Senate?

Mr. GORE. The provision in regard to the revolving fund was in section 2 of the House bill, and it was stricken out of the bill also at that place, and attached to the appropriation. I think it was section 3 as the bill passed the other House.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember the Senate having ever adopted that amendment.

Mr. GORE. It has not; but this is in the House bill, and we struck it out in the place where it occurred in the House bill and transferred it to this place; that is, we recommend that that be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], if he will permit me, that to really make this fund available we must allow it for the year to be a revolving fund. We limit its duration to July 1, 1918; it terminates then. Then it goes back into the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury can not use it any more. It might be, however, that the wheat situation would require the utilization of a large part of the fund to carry seed wheat. The money would come right back into the Treasury. It would exhaust the efforts of the department if it were not treated as a revolving fund; but the $2,500,000 is to come back into the Treasury of the United States on July 1, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that, Mr. President; but my thought was that if we adopt the principle of a revolving fund, it would be doubtful whether we should ever want $2,500,000 appropriated.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I think the amendment is a splendid thing; I think we ought to adopt it; but I also think that if we adopt the amendment so as to make a revolving fund, then at no time would the Government want $2,500,000 between the purchase of the seed and the time the seed was paid for in cash by the purchaser. I think if we adopt that amendment the amount is altogether too large.

I am, however, in full accord with the appropriation. I think, if the Government is going to carry out the policy at all, it ought to buy the seed, then deliver it to the farmer, and in turn the farmer pay the cash; but I do not believe that if it is necessary to do this that an appropriation of $2,500,000 will be required.

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator that we have cut down the appropriation available under this paragraph from $5,700,000 to $2,500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that.

Mr. GORE. I may say further that there were members of the committee who took the view of this appropriation which the Senator from Utah has expressed, that a million and a half dollars, with a revolving fund attached, will serve every purpose. The committee, however, gave the matter pretty thorough consideration, and finally decided in favor of a two-and-one-half-million-dollar appropriation. My own view was that it would not be necessary to have so large an amount; but since it comes back into the Treasury, of course there can be no serious objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. All I desire to say is that we have now to provide through taxation to raise so many millions and billions of dollars, and if we can save a million dollars we ought to do it.

I believe the Senator will admit that if we make this appropriation a revolving fund there never could be a time when the Government of the United States would require more than a million and a half dollars for all the purposes of the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Utah will move to amend the committee amendment so as to make the sum a million and a half dollars instead of two and one-half million dollars, I think we shall all vote for the amendment, although we have not any authority to act for the committee. I argued along that line in committee, but the majority of the committee felt the other way, so I do not know that I ought to undertake to speak at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I will move to amend the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. Before the Senator from Utah offers that amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FALL. I think, on consideration, the Senator may possibly agree with me——

Mr. SMOOT. Possibly so.

Mr. FALL. That it would be better to strike out the provision for the revolving fund, as proposed by the committee, than to reduce the amount.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think so.

Mr. FALL. I can not agree with the Senator that any such amount would not be absolutely necessary to be used at one time. A million and a half dollars might not serve the purpose. If this sum is not needed, then, I will say, it would not be used.

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment providing for the revolving fund be adopted, then the Government of the United States could perhaps purchase $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 worth of seed and meet every demand of the country; but if the amendment is not adopted, the Government of the United States is limited to a $2,500,000 purchase. I do not believe at any time there would be a purchase of seed amounting to more than a million and a half dollars, providing the seed is sold immediately to the farmers. The purchaser will have to pay cash for the seed, and the price paid comes right back into the revolving fund.

Mr. FALL. I understand that. If the Senator could assure me by any evidence of any kind or character that it would not be necessary to have the $2,500,000 to start with, that we would not purchase as much seed as $2,500,000 worth at one time, then his argument would be absolutely convincing. But I do not agree with him.

I say again that, in my judgment, the United States Government will be compelled to procure from foreign markets seeds which are to be used for various food and other necessary crops here in the United States, for if the United States Government in this time of war is going to control practically the imports to and the exports from this country and the purchases from foreign countries, individuals can not reach the foreign markets. I think it is necessary, as I undertook to explain the other day, that the United States Government should intervene on behalf of the sugar farmers. The Senator knows the condition of that industry in the State of Utah, for instance, and I know what the condition is in New Mexico, where one or two new industries of this kind are being established. I know something also about the beet-sugar industry in the State of Colorado; and the Senator from Utah certainly will bear me out in the statement that it is necessary for the beet-sugar growers to procure foreign seeds.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator from Utah fully realizes that; and the Senator from Utah knows also that there is not a sugar company in the United States that would not gladly deposit with the Government of the United States a certified check in payment of seeds. In one instance I remember a number of years ago Germany would not take the certified check of any bank in the United States and the sugar companies actually deposited the gold in order that they might get the seed from Germany.

Mr. FALL. The Senator is speaking of the sugar refiners.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am speaking of the sugar companies.

Mr. FALL. The individual beet-sugar farmer can not control his exchange in that way. He does not want to deposit his money for the seed, but desires to pay for it when received. I know what the custom is; I am just as familiar with it in a certain way as is the Senator. The refiners are in the habit of furnishing for cash or on credit beet-sugar growers their beet seed.

Mr. SMOOT. The beet grower has never, I presume, in all the history of the United States purchased beet seed. The sugar company advances the beet seed to him.

Mr. FALL. I am assuring the Senator that I am perfectly aware of the custom. On the other hand, I want the Government of the United States, if it is going to furnish seed at all, to furnish it to the man who needs it and to put him in a position where he is not compelled to rely, as he has heretofore, upon the good graces of the sugar refiners.

I see I am trespassing upon the time of the Senator. I was simply interjecting some observations into his remarks for his benefit as well as my own, to see if we could not get together. I am sorry I can not have his attention. I will not make any further argument. The Senator can go ahead. I will oppose the amendment, however, very strenuously.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia claimed my attention for a moment. I am sorry the Senator from New Mexico takes exception to that.

Mr. FALL. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am not taking exception to anything.

Mr. SMOOT. I was listening to what the Senator said. What I desired to accomplish was to bring about an agreement as to the amount to be appropriated. I was saying to the Senator from Georgia—I will tell the Senator from New Mexico, that we would have to provide another million dollars if an amendment were not adopted.

I will simply say further that I am willing to allow the $2,500,000 to be adopted, although I do not believe that it will ever be used by the Government at any one time.

Mr. FALL. Then, if it is not used, it will not be lost.

Mr. SMOOT. But we will have to provide for it; and we are compelled already to provide for millions and billions of dollars.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator does not object to the revolving-fund feature of the provision?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly not. The revolving-fund provision is the best part of the whole paragraph.

Mr. BRADY. I understand the Senator from Utah withdraws his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. To conform with the bill as amended, the words "section 3," on page 6, line 12, should be changed to "section 2."

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 12, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out "three" and insert in lieu thereof "two," so as to read "section 2 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 6, after line 14, to strike out "For the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products, $441,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 21, after the word "others," to strike out "$4,348,400" and insert "$3,000,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, nd urban agents and others, $3,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think the amount was $4,500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount of the House bill was $4,348,400.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] raised the question. I will inquire if he has any objection to simply taking the House provision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I very seriously object to the committee amendment reducing the amount in this instance to $3,000,000.

Mr. GORE. I have already asked, and will renew the request, that the committee amendment be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. I shall ask that the amount appropriated be made to conform to the action heretofore taken by the Senate; but I will wait until the committee amendments have been disposed of. The Senate has already taken action on this matter, and I wish to conform the bill to the action of the Senate; but I will not make the motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 1, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "one," and in line 7, after the word "practicable," to insert "without occasioning delay," so as to make the paragraph read:

For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purpose of section 1 of this act; extending and enlarging the market news service; and preventing waste of food in storage, in transit, or held for sale; advice concerning the market movement or distribution of perishable products, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of this act, $2,522,000: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall, so far as practicable, without occasioning delay, engage the services of women for the work herein provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 16, after the word "editions," to strike out "$547,400" and insert "$1,200,000," so as to make the paragraph read:

For miscellaneous items, including the salaries of Assistant Secretaries appointed under this act; special work in crop estimating; aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor; enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions, $1,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to offer an amendment, although it is not an amendment to the committee amendment. After the word "printing," on line 14, page 7, I move to insert the words "at the Government Printing Office." I do that so that the provision will conform to the present law.

Mr. GORE. I think there will be no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 14, after the word "printing," it is proposed to insert "at the Government Printing Office."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 7, after line 21, to insert:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to submit to Congress at its regular session in December of each year a detailed report of the expenditure of all moneys herein appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 8, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation, or member of a partnership, carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years: Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him, shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of Senators present to this section. At the outset I desire to say that I am in hearty and thorough accord with the object sought to be attained, namely, the prevention of undue storage for speculative purposes; but may I call the attention of the Senate to this language, which provides?—

That any person * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Mr. President, there are two proper functions to be performed by storage—one to serve the producer and one to serve the consumer. The serving of the producer is performed by reason of the fact that by the use of storage the food market is not glutted at the time of the harvest of the particular food article nor the price of the article depressed down to such a level as to ruin the man who raises it. The service to the consumer is performed by reason of the fact that by storing the article, or the surplus of that article, at the time it is harvested the supply can be made to last throughout the year. If this language is taken literally, it will be a felony for anybody to store any food for the purpose of limiting the supply to the public temporarily. I am sure the Senate does not intend to do that.

Take, for instance, the storage of eggs. I think I am correct in saying that the great bulk of the supply of eggs is gathered during the spring months and put in cold storage until the fall and winter. What is the purpose of putting them in storage? To limit temporarily the supply to the public, in one sense. If you do not limit temporarily the supply to the public, and if you compel the sale of those eggs at that time, the men who are running the chicken farms will not get enough for their eggs to pay their expenses and the eggs will all be consumed before the winter is half over. Yet, literally, this language will make it a felony to store those eggs for the purpose of temporarily limiting the supply to the public.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I think the Senator is fully aware of the fact that the attempt of the committee was simply to stop monopolization of the necessities of life.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely; yes.

Mr. BRADY. There is a great deal of force in the argument the Senator is making relative to the language of the bill. May

I ask the Senator if he has any suggestion to make as to a different form of language that would carry out the purpose of the committee to stop monopolization of the necessaries of life?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I think I am in hearty agreement with the objection raised by the Senator from New York; and in answer to the question just propounded by the Senator from Idaho I will make this suggestion: If on line 8 the word "or" was stricken out and the words "and unreasonably" inserted, would not that meet the objection and cover the proposition? Then it would read "shall store, acquire, and unreasonably hold"—not "or unreasonably hold," but "and unreasonably hold."

Mr. BRADY. On what line would the Senator from New Mexico have that inserted?

Mr. FALL. On line 8 I suggest striking out the word "or" before the word "hold" and inserting the words "and unreasonably." I might suggest to the Senator from New York that of course I have in mind the fact that this is simply one of two or three bills which are proposed to be enacted.

Mr. BRADY. Would it not be possible to change the language so that there would be no excuse whatever given for the destruction of any article of food? Could we not change that language so as to let this provision remain with regard to destroying food and allow some other language to be inserted, which I should be glad to have the Senator from New York suggest, relative to unreasonable storage?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico is exactly in line with what I wanted to bring before the Senate. If that is not adopted and this bill as it is written to-day is enacted and literally enforced, there will be no storage at all in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. FALL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the wording of this bill:

> Shall store, acquire, or hold * * * for the purpose of limiting the supply.

Now, any acquiring or holding or storing that is not for the purpose of limiting the supply will be perfectly legal under this act. For instance, the object—the ostensible object, at any rate, and it ought to be the real and the only object—of cold storage is to conserve the supply of foodstuffs of the kind that are put in cold storage. All that this bill does is to prohibit them from storing or holding articles in cold storage for the purpose of limiting the supply. They ought to be prohibited from storing for that purpose. As long as they store for the purpose of conserving the food it is perfectly apparent that they are within the law, and I think the objection is not tenable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee did not finish the reading of those sentences. They read not only "for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public" but also "or affecting the market price thereof."

Mr. GORE and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment. Now, it is impossible to store anything without limiting the supply temporarily to the public or affecting the price temporarily to the public. It can not be helped.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator is in error about that. For instance, take the question of eggs. The time when eggs are produced to a very much larger extent than they are consumed in the country is in the months of March, April, and May in each year. Now, after the supply is sufficient to meet the demand, then the increased numbers make no difference, and, according to the theory of cold storage, the overplus is simply stored away for those months in the year like October, November, and December, when the supply is not equal to the demand. Under those circumstances cold storage performs one of the most effective and useful functions that can be imagined. It is the greatest conservator of food that can be imagined. But when it is used not for that purpose, not for the purpose of conserving the supply for the lean months in the fall and winter following, but for the purpose of limiting either the price or the demand, it is very wrongful, and I think one of the greatest wrongs that can be committed upon the American people. It seems to me that that ought to be the idea which we will carry out in this bill, and I think this bill does carry it out. If it does not carry it out it ought to be made to carry it out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to take just the case cited by the Senator from Tennessee and show him that the purchase of eggs and putting them into cold storage during the months of April and May, when there are more eggs produced in this country than it is possible to consume, does affect the price. It affects the price in this way: If the eggs were not placed in cold storage during those months the price of eggs would be so low that they would be hardly worth shipping to market.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely true.

Mr. SMOOT. But the cold-storage people buy those eggs and thereby enhance during those months the price the eggs would bring if there were no cold-storage concerns, and therefore it affects the price. I know the object of the amendment was to cover cases where they would increase the price.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I am inclined to think that the suggestion the Senator makes there is absolutely correct. There ought to be another word used there besides "affecting" that would effect the intention of the Senate in passing this legislation. I am inclined to think the Senator is entirely right.

Mr. SMOOT. This would cover a decrease in price, the Senator will see. That would affect the price.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question that if any product of the farm or the field is put into cold storage, it can not help but affect the price, either increasing the price or decreasing it; and we do not want to pass a law that would prevent the conservation of food in any way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course not.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma. I do not intend to hold the floor and parcel it out. I want a chance to offer a perfecting amendment.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator from New York permit me to say, first——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GORE (continuing). That I think probably the point made by the Senator from Utah is correct; but that is not the purpose of placing the eggs in cold storage. It must be the purpose to affect the supply and the price. Now, of course, purchasing in the spring perhaps raises the price in the spring, but it also lowers the price in the winter; and cold storage is essential to the maintenance of the supply. I think when you take into account the use of the word "purpose" it is not liable to the objection mentioned. Of course, it ought to be made plain.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he does not think the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico would cover the point.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if I may explain the purpose of the amendment, it is to make this section conform as nearly as possible to the old laws against engrossing, forestalling, and regrating, which were adopted in Great Britain in 1554, and which were kept on the statute books until 1844, the definition of which is so well settled that the courts know exactly how to deal with them; but there never was any law attempted to be passed at any time from the year 1258. I think it was, when the first law along this line was passed, which did not allow the storing of goods, provided it was reasonable and was not for the purpose of controlling or affecting the price.

I have the definitions before me as laid down in the law books in a long line of decisions:

> Engrossing: Purchasing either the whole or large quantities of (the commodities) so as to control the market and enhance the price, and so make a monopoly profit; also, to obtain control of (the market) in this way.
> Forestall: To anticipate or prevent the normal trade in (a fair market, etc.) by buying or contracting for merchandise or provisions on its way to market—
>
> Our modern experience with forestalling is what we call gambling in price, very largely—one of the forms of it, at least—> buying or contracting for merchandise or provisions on its way to market with the intention of selling it again at a higher price, or by dissuading persons from bringing their goods there, or persuading them to enhance the price when there.
>
> The third offense under these laws was known as regrating.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. BRADY. Whose definition is it that the Senator is reading?

Mr. FALL. I am reading the definition taken from Bouvier, as collated from the English decisions, a line of about 300 years of decisions on exactly such propositions as are involved in this amendment; and in every one, of course, there is something which is to be prohibited. Now, that is not the storing of goods for the benefit of the people, but that is the unreasonable holding for the purpose of controlling the price, affecting the market, raising the price, and securing, as is said, a monopoly profit. For that reason, in order that this section might be brought more nearly in line with the legal decisions on this subject, I suggested the striking out of the word "or" and the insertion of the words "and unreasonably," in line 8.

In answer to the objection made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] as to the following provisions, in lines 8 and 9, I will say that the insertion of these words would not affect at all that provision which makes it absolutely a felony to destroy or make away with any article, whether reasonably or unreasonably. The word "reasonably" would not apply to that section. There is a comma after the word.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from New Mexico feels, then, that inserting the word "unreasonably" will correct the amendment so that it will be effective?

Mr. FALL. "And unreasonably hold"; yes. I have a further idea in view, as I suggested to the Senator from New York; that is, that there are other propositions pending before one or the other branch of this Congress affecting foodstuffs; and if a measure along the lines of the Lever bill, now pending in the House, does pass and become a law, then whoever is in charge of the food products or handling them in any way would have no difficulty in saying whether or not the goods so stored were being unreasonably held.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from New York, if that correction meets his approval, that he offer the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is immaterial to me whether the Senator from New Mexico or myself offers it. Perhaps we can do it jointly.

Mr. BRADY. I simply suggested it for the reason that I did not understand that the Senator from New Mexico had offered it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is his suggestion, Mr. President. It is entirely acceptable to me.

Mr. FALL. Then, in the time of the Senator from New York, I now offer that as an amendment—to strike out the word "or" in line 8, and insert the words "and unreasonably," leaving the comma after the word "hold."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not prevail. To my mind it leaves the law in substance as it is. The Sherman Act in its first section forbids all kinds of combinations or contracts in restraint of trade. The second section forbids monopolizing or attempting to monopolize any portion of commerce between the various States. I think the construction given to that act has been such as that, with the incorporation of the amendment now suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, we would be simply reenacting the second section of the Sherman Act and modifying the penalty which it imposes.

I feel as if I ought to say that this section of the bill originated with a bill introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. That bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and by the Judiciary Committee to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and myself. The Senator from Georgia was not able to act upon the committee, and the Senator from Washington and I called to our aid Mr. Todd, the Assistant Attorney General, who for more than a half dozen years past has had charge of the prosecution under the antitrust act. The draft which is now incorporated as an amendment to this bill is the result of our work. The subcommittee reported to the Judiciary Committee, which on last Monday approved its work, and reported the bill to the Senate. It is now on the calendar. The result of the work apparently has been adopted by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which tenders it as section 8 of this bill.

I would be glad to give the Senate the benefit of the views which were entertained by the committee and the ideas which they intended to express in the bill which I have referred to and which has become section 8.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator if the language of the amendment is identically the language reported by the Senate committee.

Mr. WALSH. It is, except for the proviso.

Mr. CURTIS. That is, beginning in line 14.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It was not only reported by the subcommittee, but reported by the full committee, and was also reported by the Committee on Agriculture. It has been before two full committees and reported from them.

Mr. WALSH. I call the attention of the Senate to the language which clearly centers the criminality of the act in the purpose with which it is done. It was intended to reach only those individuals who gather up enough of any particular commodity to actually affect the price of that commodity. I may say that the Judiciary Committee, as a whole, have reported the bill, with the word "enhance" substituted for the word "affect." I shall at the appropriate time submit that as an amendment to the pending amendment. The idea was to reach those who gather up enough of a particular commodity to affect the price of it or enhance the price of it, and who gather it up with a set purpose thus to enhance the price.

To my mind, Mr. President, the proviso added by the Committee on Agriculture is entirely unnecessary. I shall not object to it at all because it simply makes clearer the idea which the committee had in mind. It was not intended at all to reach the case of a farmer who has a thousand bushels of grain or two thousand bushels of grain or ten thousand bushels of grain, the aggregate being inconsequential in amount as compared with the total of that particular commodity. The farmer may be disposed to hold his grain and sell it in the spring instead of selling it in the fall. He recognizes that the amount which he has will not make any sensible effect upon the price. He is simply going to hold his grain to await the operation of economical elements, the natural operation of supply and demand. He is going to withhold his grain until those operate to produce a higher price than that which he can command at the present time. If he is simply holding it for the purpose of awaiting an increase in price as the result of the normal conditions of supply and demand, he does not fall under the condemnation of this statute at all. It is only the individual who goes out and gathers up enough of the visible supply with a set purpose to have the price increased by reason of the fact that he holds so large a quantity of it which he does not put upon the market that the statute is intended to reach. It occurs to me that the language is entirely plain and does not need any further language to make it so.

Mr. PAGE. Could a combination of farmers in a given section, by conferences or combinations, in any way bring them within the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will recall that under the decisions of the courts farmers thus associating would be amenable to the first section of the Sherman act, but in the Clayton act we provided that the act should not be deemed to apply to associations of farmers or other producers of foodstuffs or to associations of laboring men.

Mr. PAGE. If no harm is done by this added clause of the Committee on Agriculture, does not the Senator believe that it would be well enough to have it appear lest there be some fear in that regard?

Mr. WALSH. I wish to state to the Senator that I am quite satisfied it shall remain. I have no objection to it at all. Indeed, it might aid in dissipating any misapprehension which might arise in the minds of anyone lest farmers who just hold their grain until there is a higher price might become subject to the act.

Mr. PAGE. Then, going further on the same line, can any harm come from introducing the two words, so as to read, "shall store or acquire and unreasonably hold"? I can see that it might all be plain to the legal mind without the introduction of those words, but I can not see that it would do any harm.

Mr. WALSH. I think they would entirely rob the statute of any force or effect. If one now gathers up any considerable quantity of a particular commodity and unreasonably holds it, I have no doubt in the world that he is now amenable to the second section of the Sherman Act.

Mr. PAGE. Does not the Senator believe that we oftentimes pass laws here that are clear to the legal mind, but about which to the layman there is great uncertainty, and since we are trying to make this provision clear to the world why, if it is doing no harm, should we not include the words "and unreasonably"; or do I understand the Senator to say that to do so would change the legal meaning?

Mr. WALSH. It would, to my mind, very radically change the meaning. We have it now that anyone who holds his commodity for the purpose of enhancing the price of it—that is, not to wait until the price is enhanced by conditions over which he has no control, but the man who holds his commodity for the purpose of enhancing the price—makes himself amenable. The amendment would read that one who unreasonably holds for the purpose of enhancing the price, and it need not be said that the two statements do not mean one and the same thing.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to see if I can possibly understand the meaning of it. I call attention to the fact that the offense is committed either in the storing, the acquiring, or the holding of these products. If any one of those three things is done for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof, the party so holding, storing, or acquiring shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Now, we will suppose that one who has storage capacity not for public storing, but his own private storing capacity, buys eggs in June for 25 cents a dozen. He is holding them, of course, for the purpose of selling them at some later day for a higher price. There are two matters that you have to consider at that time under the terms of this bill. The first is that if he acquires them for the purpose of affecting the price he is guilty of the offense under the clear letter of the law, and inasmuch as he is presumed to contemplate the natural result of his act he is presumed to know that if the hens of this country lay 100,000,000 eggs in a day and he buys 10,000,000 eggs in a day necessarily that will have an effect upon the price, and it will prevent them from going down as far as they otherwise would go or being as cheap to the purchasers in the cities as they would otherwise be, and then he has committed an offense.

Then, too, if he is buying at all he must hold for the purpose of getting a raise. We put in the word "unreasonable." Who is to determine that? Who is to pass upon the question of unreasonableness? One jury will find that if he buys eggs for 25 cents a dozen and holds them until he can get 50 cents a dozen in the wintertime he has committed a crime. Another jury might hold that he committed a crime if he sold them for 35 cents a dozen. So you have got no standard.

That is not all. When he buys those eggs at 25 cents a dozen he has no means at that time of knowing exactly how much they will go up, and therefore his offense consists not in what he has in contemplation at the time he buys them, but it depends entirely upon the question of supply and demand which would raise them. If six months after he has made his purchases and stored the eggs there is a demand for eggs which would raise them to 50 cents a dozen, he has committed a crime retroactively. If they go up 5 cents a dozen he has not committed any crime. Therefore, he would have to sell them for less than the market price for fear that some jury might find that he had committed an offense.

Does not the Senator think there either ought to be a standard fixed of what would be a reasonable profit either by per cent or else that the commodity must be put upon the market in a given length of time?

Mr. WALSH. No; Mr. President, I do not see any occasion for a provision along those lines at all. But there is much in what the Senator from North Dakota has said to the effect that a criminal statute would be altogether vague in its terms if you put the term "unreasonable" in here. No man would ever know under a statute of that character whether he had been guilty of the commission of a crime or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, if he has actually acquired the property and is subsequently holding it for the purpose of enhancing the price to the public he knows that, and he is not in any doubt at all; but if he commits a crime only when he unreasonably holds he never knows when he has stepped across the line of criminality. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Following up just what the Senator is saying, would it not necessarily take the decision of a court? The whole question has to be referred at first to the court to determine what was an unreasonable holding.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and worse than that; it would have to be submitted to a jury. One jury might hold that under such circumstances one man has unreasonably held his commodities and convict him, and another jury under exactly the same conditions and circumstances would hold that the man had not unreasonably held them and acquit him. Thus the law itself would deservably fall into disrepute and contempt.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I know the Senator is on one of the committees that has had the consideration of this matter in charge, and I know that he has probably given all phases of it careful study. I know he is also familiar with the fruit industry of the Northwest. I wish to get an expression from the Senator as to whether he thinks that this provision would affect the business of our cold-storage houses engaged in the shipment of fruit. For instance, in my section of the country a great many of the fruit producers sell their apples in the fall to the warehouseman who has a cold-storage plant. He puts these apples in cold storage and holds them I think clearly in many cases for a better price. What I want to know is whether this section as framed would make the warehouseman under such circumstances liable for prosecution under this provision?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so at all. But, on the contrary, if the warehouseman went out and accumulated enough apples so that his supply would, if put upon the market, depress it altogether, or if he was able to control the prices or affect the prices by reason of having his supply, it would no doubt be a violation of this act. It was not intended to reach, and I do not think the language can be construed as making it reach, the ordinary case of the middleman who gathers up commodities and puts them upon the market when they command a higher price, but it was intended only to reach the one who gathers the material up for the very purpose of enhancing the price to the consumer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think I realize that that is the intention of the provision, but yet, of course, we must draw the intention from the language itself if it is clear, and it seems to me that it is clear to this effect, that if a commission man or cold-storage man goes out and buys apples he is simply buying in order to get a supply. He holds them for a better price.

Mr. WALSH. That is, he holds them, I may state to the Senator, until the operation of economic conditions sends the price higher than it was at the time he bought the apples.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The price has not gone high by reason of anything that he has done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me that the very storing and holding them by him would necessarily have some influence upon affecting the price. It seems to me that by holding and storing them in many different communities, of course, the price will go up.

Mr. WALSH. I submit to the Senator that the statute could not possibly receive any such construction as that, because that would forbid any middleman from purchasing at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is exactly what I had in mind, and I wanted to get the Senator's opinion on it, because I know he does not want to have the fruit industry affected in that way any more than I do.

Mr. WALSH. Or any other.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If that construction did follow from this language, it would shut down that man's business, and I am a little afraid this language does go that far.

Mr. WALSH. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator. His State has a large number of men who gather up fruit. Would you feel that it would be just to say that a fruit dealer in your State is acquiring a lot of fruit in order to enhance the price of that fruit on the market to consumers?

Mr. JONES of Washington. This does not say that.

Mr. WALSH. Why not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It says "shall store, acquire, or hold."

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but for the purpose of enhancing the price.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not any doubt that when a man goes out and buys fruit and puts it in refrigerator plants and holds it in order to get a better price the mere holding must affect the price more or less, and the more there is of such holding all over the country the more effect there will be upon the price. I do not think it would be just to shut out such a man from doing that thing; but it seems to me that under the language of your act he may go out and buy it in the best of faith, and even with the intention of shipping it right away in the cars. That is the purpose of his going out to buy it; but after he has it bought and by the time he gets it in he concludes that he will hold it in order to get a better price. It seems to me the language there would prevent him from doing that. The purpose of holding these things must be to get a better price. They do not hold apples for philanthropic purposes, or anything of that sort. I want to be sure that this language would not prevent legitimate action along those lines.

Mr. WALSH. If the bill read "anyone who shall hold for the purpose of getting a better price," it would meet exactly the conditions the Senator from Washington is now speaking about; but that is not the language of the bill at all. It is not holding it for the purpose of getting a better price, but holding it in order that he may boost the price by reason of his holding it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me that that is a distinction without a difference. A man must hold his fruit with the expectation to get a better price, feeling that his action will have the effect of assisting in that. I am afraid of the language, but I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the Senator. I know he wants to accomplish exactly what I do in that respect. I am simply asking the Senator for his opinion with reference to the matter, because I am not on the committee and I have not given the language any special consideration. I am glad to have the judgment of the Senator, because I have a great deal of confidence in the Senator from Montana.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. The people of the State of Washington who raise fruit ought to have every possible opportunity to get all they can for their fruit. Does not the Senator think they need all they can get?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I want to be sure about.

Mr. PAGE. And so do I, and if this end is to be secured it should be made plain that only monopoly or attempted monopoly can make a man a felon under this bill. I dislike very much to have two as good lawyers as the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Montana stand up here and disagree as to what the law means. The law ought to be made clear enough and plain enough so that the average man may understand it.

Mr. WALSH. It is useless to do that, because that is the law now. We are trying to make a law that is different from that.

Mr. PAGE. There seems to be a debate between two good lawyers as to what the bill means. I object to that kind of legislation. The statute books are full of it. Year after year we pass bills written by good lawyers and yet so ambiguous that their meaning is uncertain. I sometimes wonder if these bills would not have less of uncertainty as to their meaning if drawn by good business men rather than technical lawyers.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The trouble is not always with the bill. It is very frequently with the lawyers. The lawyers are sometimes too technical and hairsplitting, and one of the great difficulties in the enactment of legislation is the disposition to do that.

Mr. PAGE. I want protection against monopoly, and I am perfectly willing that it shall be had under this bill. I want to make the bill plain enough so that the best lawyers of the Senate will not disagree as to its provisions even before we enact the bill into law.

Mr. WALSH. I have just another word to say on this feature of the bill and then I will pass to another. I should like to say, in answer to the inquiry addressed to me by the Senator from Washington, that I am somewhat intimately familiar with the operations of the California Growers' Association. They have a State organization and there are constituent district organizations. The State organization has information every day about the amount of different fruits there are in all the great cities of the Union. They have agents in all the cities to send them reports and keep them fairly advised concerning the conditions and the prices prevailing. A certain member of a district organization has a car of stuff that he wants to ship. He ascertains what the price is to-day in the city of Chicago and in the city of New York. The price is not satisfactory to him and he concludes that he will not ship. The California Fruit Growers' Association does not fall under the operation of this act at all. I do not think anybody has ever accused the California Fruit Growers' Association of gathering up and holding all the different fruits of the State of California for the purpose of enhancing the price.

Mr. PAGE. But that has been done in regard to eggs, has it not?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; it has been done, and that is the fellow we are trying to reach, not an organization that is carrying on its business in the ordinary and usual way, and holding only until by the operation of supply and demand by the consumption of the goods that are on the market the price becomes enhanced. We are trying to reach the man who deliberately goes out for the purpose of getting this stuff, or deliberately holds it in his warehouse and cold-storage depositaries for the very purpose of enhancing the price to the community.

Mr. PAGE. Would it not, in the judgment of the Senator from Montana, convey a better idea of what we seek to do if, in line 10, instead of saying "of limiting the supply" we should say "for the purpose of effecting a monopoly in the supply"?

Mr. WALSH. No; it would not. I have tried to indicate to the Senator that that would not help at all, because that is already covered by section 2 of the Sherman Act, which reads:

That any person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize any part of the commerce between the several States shall be guilty.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator agrees that as between two good lawyers here in the Senate the words "limiting the supply" are indefinite and ambiguous.

Mr. WALSH. I was just going to talk about that feature, about limiting the supply. I have been addressing myself thus far to that portion of it which refers to enhancing or affecting the price. I was going to speak about the other portion, limiting the supply.

Mr. PAGE. But do you object to putting in the words "unreasonable holding"?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that is quite a different question.

Mr. PAGE. I am seeking light, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been thinking along the same line with the Senator from Vermont. I make this suggestion in addition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico, that in line 8, page 8, insert the word "unreasonably" before "hold," and, continuing then, "or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public," and the suggestion by the Senator from Vermont, "so as to create a monopoly," I would consider this language after the word "public," in line 10, page 8, "limit the supply thereof to the public." It relates back to any one of four acts, storing, acquiring, or unreasonably holding or destroying the food products for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public, with this language, "so as to create a monopoly" or "so as to act in unreasonable restraint of trade."

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the Senator there is no earthly use in doing that, because that is the Sherman law, and we would be simply reenacting the Sherman law if we put that language in.

Mr. SHERMAN. That demonstrates the uselessness of this section then.

Mr. WALSH. I agree that if we amended it as the Senator from Illinois suggests it would be useless, but we hope if it is not amended that way it will help some.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will permit me, for I am subject to his direction——

Mr. WALSH. I yield, certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Carrying out the idea advanced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], how long would the cold-storage men in the State of Washington be compelled to hold their apples before they began to put them on the market in Chicago or New York?

Mr. WALSH. It is not a matter of time at all. Just as soon as they begin to hold for the purpose of enhancing the price by reason of their holding they then fall under the condemnation of the act.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the inquiry of the Senator from Washington is still pertinent, because, as I understand, he asked whether, as to the time they bought and stored, the prohibition would not begin from the end of the apple season; that is, as soon as they were reasonably sure all of them were out of the orchard?

Mr. WALSH. No; that is not the idea that the language conveys at all. If the man went out and bought with a purpose to buy up so much that by reason of his purchases the price would be enhanced, he would fall under the condemnation of the act. If he did not have that purpose in the first place, but held on to them until by his very holding of them he was enhancing the price, he would then fall under the condemnation of the act.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then every cold-storage man barreling apples would, holding them, be in imminent danger of being sent to the penitentiary unless he judged correctly of just the time or place when the market begins to be enhanced by his holding, would he not?

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; just as soon as he makes up his mind that by reason of his holding he is himself enhancing the price he had better let go.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me inquire whether that would not depend upon the interpretation and the instructions of the court trying him after he is indicted?

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly; all laws do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then he might not be a criminal, although the public, when they got apple hungry, would all clamor for his crucifixion. Whether it is necessary or not I do not know; but let me make a further inquiry. Only a few days ago——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the Senator need have any fear about that, because the purpose is always there. The man must be holding the article with a purpose to enhance its value, and he could not be convicted unless the evidence was clear and beyond a reasonable doubt that that was his purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, let me inquire further if it would be possible for a man to accumulate any food product and hold it beyond the time when the season for producing it had ended without subjecting himself to imminent danger of being convicted of a felony? He might not intend it, but the necessary effect of his accumulating and keeping the article would make a rise of the market whether he intended it or not, and the jurors or the court would say that every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his own act. There would be a constructive felony. In what condition would the defendant then find himself who had been storing apples in Seattle?

Mr. WALSH. That is holding in cold storage after the season had expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. For how long?

Mr. WALSH. It is not a matter of how long; it is long enough until he intends that by his holding the prices shall be enhanced.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has the floor. I am through for the present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We might as well make the inquiry in the trial of a case that involved the punishment of death—determining the question of whether a homicide was murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree—and say that you could not enforce the law and convict a man of murder in the first degree, because you could not tell how long he had a premeditated intent to kill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, outside of certain forms of preserved foods, nobody in handling food products has any intent to kill, unless he is peddling mince meat from New England [laughter], and it might be in this case at his peril. That was the point to which my inquiry was directed; that at the end of the season, when the productive period was passed, and the holder had stored in a warehouse a given quantity of some seasonable products, there begins to be a demand.

I pay 5 cents apiece for Seattle or Washington apples through the winter; sometimes I get only four for a quarter. I used to think that that was too much; but at the same time that I am paying from 4 to 6 cents apiece for apples from the State of Washington on the market in Chicago or elsewhere somebody in a cold-storage warehouse on the Pacific coast, or at some other convenient point, has 100,000 barrels of apples stored. He is holding them, and letting loose 10,000 barrels at a time, to be distributed to the Chicago market. Why does he not also turn loose the other 90,000 barrels which he has? That would put apples down to 1 cent apiece. You might just as well say that because he does not turn them all loose on the market he has committed dietetic homicide on me. With me apples are a necessity, though, Mr. President—I am presuming on the good nature of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]—it was stated here in a letter from a railroad man, which was read on the freight question, that apples are a luxury. With me apples are a necessity of life. I eat them every day, and have done so ever since I can remember. It is just as much a corner in affecting the price of a necessity for me to have apples kept out of the market as it would be for beefsteak to be kept out of the market for some of our English brthren who were on the commission here a few days ago.

That is the question I am asking the Senator to shed the light of his information upon; and I say frankly that I have been very much instructed by what the Senator has said. I mean what I say about that. To adhere now to the production of apples on the Pacific coast, when the seasonable time has passed and the product is stored, then the warehouseman holds at his peril, and he would either go to the penitentiary if he judges incorrectly or be freed if he judges otherwise. There is no minimizing the danger in this proposition. I am asking whether that will not, instead of conserving food products—because that is the principal thing—have the opposite effect? After all, cold storage is a modern thing. It is only since artificial ice has been made possible in a cheaply commercial form that cold storage has become a profitable enterprise. I can remember the first cold-storage warehouse that was ever built in this country. The purpose of a cold-storage warehouse is partly what the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and other Senators have stated. The principal economic value of a cold-storage warehouse is the preservation of food which otherwise would rot or spoil. That is the great and only feature of the warehouse process. The Pacific coast apples would largely be lost if it were not for artificial storage. There would be only a limited and local consumption, where now it is national; and those apples are known all over the country. This is the economic function which we shall disturb by drastic legislation of this kind if we are not careful and if we impose the risk upon the cold-storage warehouseman of being convicted and sent to the penitentiary.

The question of intent is the most variable and shifting in the world. Nobody knows that better than lawyers who have been around courts for a while. I might, in the murder case suggested, be guilty of either manslaughter or murder in one or some of the other degrees provided by statute. Who is to determine that? And last it is to be a jury trying the issues of fact, and under the interpretation and instructions of the court.

If the cold-storage warehouseman faces that alternative under such provisions as this, there will be fewer cold-storage warehouses in the country than there now are. Instead of conserving food we shall lose it, for these warehouses take perishable articles only. I am asking the Senator what would, in his judgment, be the effect upon the food conservation of the country of such a provision as that?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that it will affect the supply of food of the community nor the activities of the cold-storage warehouses in the slightest degree. I have not any doubt in the world that the great majority of these men conduct their business upon strictly honorable and business lines, intending only to hold until the ordinary operations make it profitable to sell, and they thereupon sell.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. PAGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH. I have a word to say to the Senator as soon as I can get an opportunity to do so, but I will yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to suggest to the Senator from Montana that probably we could make this provision clear, so that it would be satisfactory to all, if we should put at the end of line 18 a second proviso, which would read as follows:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such articles for such advanced price as might be obtained in an unrestricted market.

I do not know that I have embodied that in the best possible language, but what I mean is to protect those who merely purchase in the summer time, having their cold-storage plants, and expect to receive a higher price in the ordinary market, and not in a cornered market, to which they are a party. I do not know but that some other word than "unrestricted" might be better; but if we could put a proposition of this kind into the bill and let the bill go to conference, the exact language could be used which would express the idea, which is intended to protect legitimate business in buying and storing with the expectation of getting a better price in a free and open market.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, personally I should have no objection at all to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. It may possibly make the idea more clear. I have not had an opportunity to study it with care, but, in a general way, it expresses the ideas which I have been vainly endeavoring to indicate are to be conveyed by the language used.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WALSH. I should like to say to the Senator from Vermont before he addresses a further question to me that I have another word to add in relation to his question concerning the use of the word "unreasonable," and I should also be thankful for the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], by whom it was proposed. The very idea of this provision is that one who holds a commodity for the purpose of enhancing its price holds unreasonably; that it is an unreasonable thing for him to hold it for the purpose of enhancing its price. So that it is not necessary to add the word "unreasonable."

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question on that very point. Suppose that one of our Vermont fruit producers finds that he can not sell his apples, which he is ordinarily able to sell for perhaps $4 a barrel in the spring, for more than $2 a barrel in the fall. He sends them to a cold-storage warehouse in New York to be held for his account. When he ships them there it is for the express purpose of getting a higher price. He holds them for the sole and only purpose of getting a higher price precisely as provided in this section. This being confessed, is he not a felon under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. No; that is not what the section provides at all—not for the purpose of getting a higher price.

Mr. PAGE. "For the purpose of * * * affecting the market price." I do not know what else that language means.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly, for the purpose of enhancing the price.

Mr. PAGE. Now, let us go a little further. Somebody in New York who wants to make trouble for this Vermont farmer who is holding his apples to secure a higher price asks, "Why not bring this matter before the grand jury?" This section of this proposed law is thereupon consulted. My complaint is that it does not provide, as I think it should, that to constitute a felony it should be clearly shown that the purpose of holding these apples was to create a monopoly.

Mr. WALSH. Let me interrupt the Senator long enough to say that the very case he cites is covered in any case by the proviso, which reads:

Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act.

Mr. PAGE. I accept the correction; but let us suppose, as is often the case, that there is a joint arrangement between the farmer and the cold-storage commission merchant, so that the matter might legally come before a New York City grand jury. Under the pressure of local excitement growing out of the high prices of apples, is there much doubt about an indictment resulting? How long does the Senator think a farmer in Vermont or a cold-storage proprietor in New York City, with a State's prison before their eyes, is going to store apples or any other commodity?

If it may clearly appear that they shall not be held to be felons unless they intentionally bring about or aid in bringing about a monopoly I do not object to this legislation, but I think the language should be clear and unambiguous on this point. I do not believe we ought to enact this provision if the Senator from Montana, who is an excellent lawyer, and the Senator from Washington, who is another, disagree as to its provisions. Let us have the language clean-cut enough and clear enough so that the idea of monopoly will stand forth plain and strong, or let us cut out the amendment entire.

Mr. WALSH. I have an idea that the Senator from Vermont would despair by this time of ever getting language in any bill that the lawyers of the Senate would agree upon; but let me remark that he may take some consolation out of the old story about the judge who set the verdict of the jury aside and said, "It took 13 men to steal a farm in that court." The Vermont farmer is not obliged to depend upon the verdict of a jury in New York; he has the court to protect him under any circumstances.

Mr. PAGE. But the whole question is one of intent. If a man seeks to get a higher price or to secure more for his property, may he not be properly regarded as a felon under this section of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. I have just a word to say in explanation of the language "limiting the supply thereof to the public." Ordinarily, Mr. President, the acquisition or holding or storing would be for the purpose of enhancing the price, and the price would be enhanced by limiting the supply, so that for all ordinary purposes the language "enhancing the price" would seem to meet all the requirements of the case; but the committee had in mind that there might be some adherents of our enemies in this country who might, conceivably at least, gather up a considerable portion of the food supply, having no purpose to enhance the price at all, but the purpose being to keep it away from the public. So the language "limiting the supply" was put in there to meet a case of that kind.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will have to leave the Senate in a very few moments to attend a meeting of the Finance Committee, which is considering the revenue bill. I feel very much interest in the section under consideration, and I am very much in sympathy with its general purposes. I wish, however, to offer an amendment, to which I invite the attention of the chairman and other members of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. After the word "shall" in the committee amendment, at the end of line 8, on page 8, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words:

Within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, or the Territories or other possessions of the United States, or while in transit from any foreign port to any port of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can not be here when the amendment is voted upon, but I should like to say just a word or two regarding it. It has come to our knowledge that large quantities of food products have been destroyed by being dumped into the water on rivers and on the sea. The chief purpose of this amendment is to try to reach and remedy the evil of destroying food products on the high seas while in transit from a foreign port to a port of the United States.

Only within the last few days I heard it stated before a committee that large amounts of coffee purchased by American importers and in transit to American ports had been thrown into the sea for fear that the accumulation of a large amount of coffee might tend to reduce the price. I have heard the same thing said about bananas and other articles of food.

Of course, the question is as to how far our courts can take cognizance in a criminal way of importers who are bringing food products to the United States and destroying them; but I would feel very strongly disposed to leave that question, so far as it is one of doubt, to judicial interpretation. I propose the amendment with a view to remedying what is certainly a positive evil of the nature to which I have diverted, and to leave it to the chairman and other members of the committee for such consideration as they may care to give to it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course I have no authority to accept the amendment on behalf of the committee, but I see no objection to it. It seems to me it is directed toward an evil that ought to be remedied.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I am no more affected, of course, by the amendment than any other Senator or any other person in the United States. Further than that, I never have any pride of opinion of authorship. If an amendment is suggested to wording which I have something to do with, I am always willing to listen and very often can be convinced that an improvement would be made by the adoption of the suggestion.

I think the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] might have been carried even a little bit further. I often doubt the wisdom of electing lawyers to legislative bodies. I think if they were prohibited holding seats in legislative bodies the people might possibly get something done in a businesslike way by simply employing a lawyer from the outside to lick their bills into shape. Lawyers disagree. Certainly that is true when one who may not have the ability of the other looks at the matter from a business standpoint, while the other regards it from the viewpoint of a technical pleader who, having accepted a case for a client, will cross-examine everyone who does not happen to think along the lines that he is thinking for the purpose of throwing confusion upon him and upon his suggestion.

Mr. President, the purpose of storing goods in cold storage and its necessary effect is to limit the supply to some parts of the public at some particular time. The beneficial effect of it to the public is that by such storing of goods when there is a glut or an overplus in the market at some given place and at some given time that glut in the market may be used to the advantage of the general public, possibly some portion of the public a thousand miles away, by supplying them with something which they could not otherwise acquire.

Under modern conditions the business men of the United States have built up the greatest equalizing system that the world has ever known of the products of the farms, the orchards, the fields, and of husbandry generally. The very often damned packing establishments of Kansas City, Chicago, and other places of the great West have done in many respects a most magnificent work for the people of this country. To use the illustration which has been referred to here this morning in the storage of eggs, one of the objects is to prevent a glut in the market in certain months when eggs are selling at 10 cents a dozen, for example. If there are proper storage facilities for them, by taking a large portion of them from the market a glut is prevented, and it is made possible to provide the people of New York and Boston with eggs at something like a reasonable price when they are needed at a season when they are not produced in New York or in Boston.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have to leave at 3 o'clock for a meeting of the Committee on Finance. I should like to introduce an amendment at this time and have it pending if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted between lines 18 and 19 on page 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Dakota that there is already an amendment pending.

Mr. McCUMBER. This can be offered and lie on the table, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the amendment read if the Senator will yield long enough to have that done.

Mr. FALL. I have no objection if we can get through with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 18, after the word "act" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such articles for such advanced price as might be received or obtained in a free, unrestricted market.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, for the purpose of clearing the record allow me to remark that there is one amendment first offered, and which I am now proceeding to discuss. There have been two amendments offered to this section since that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course, the amendment just read will not be in order until the others are disposed of.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the holding of supplies for the purposes which I have mentioned is legitimate. The holding of supplies for the purpose of monopolizing or affecting to the advantage of the person holding them the price of the articles should be restricted, and in so far as this section proposes to effect that end I am in accord with it. I think anyone can understand what the intention was without having it read to us time and again. By reading I think we can understand what the intention was—those of us who are possessed of average intelligence. The question as to whether the wording of it reaches that end is one for possible dispute, or at any rate for discussion, and that I think is the matter which is now being referred to.

Mr. President, this section, if adopted, will be repealed, provided you follow the administration program with reference to other legislation now pending. It is in absolute conflict with the entire tenor and effect of the so-called Lever bill. I do not know what the purpose of those on the other side is in reference to the Lever bill, but so far as I am concerned I propose to support it when I have an opportunity, with the exception of one or two amendments or suggestions. But I am in accord with the theory of it, and I am in accord with the provisions of this bill in so far as they go along with and supplement the proposed general legislation as to the distribution, conservation, and regulation of prices of foodstuffs to the people of this country and to our allies.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator, as an attorney, will understand better than I the language contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. As the Senator from Missouri is absent from the Chamber at the moment, I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from New Mexico relative to the words "while in transit from any foreign port to any port of the United States." Does the Senator feel that we would have jurisdiction over any cargo while it was in transit from a foreign port to a port in the United States?

Mr. FALL. I think we would, Mr. President, if the ship were ours, or sailing under governmental supervision, or if we followed out the general theory of the supplementary legislation or of the principal legislation which the administration is asking Congress to pass. Then possibly the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which I have only just heard, might be legal or constitutional, and it might be advisable to pass it. However, I should like the Senator to excuse me now from definitely offering an opinion upon the latter amendment.

Mr. BRADY. Permit me to say that I am in hearty accord with the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, and I was just wondering whether or not we would be safe in using the particular language in the amendment. If not, I hope it will be perfected.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have in my hand House bill 4630, which is now pending before that body. One of the purposes dealt with in this bill is the very matter to which I have referred as one of the objects of storing supplies, storing perishable products—to prevent gluts in the market. By the Lever bill persons are authorized to do exactly what this bill sends a man to the penitentiary for doing. Further than that, under the provisions of the Lever bill, if you have facilities for storing and you do not store, you are guilty of a felony. In other words, you shall not permit waste. Those are perfectly legitimate and perfectly proper subjects of legislation. I do not know whether, in preparing the bill, they had the advice of the Senator from Montana or of some other eminent attorney; but in section 4 of the Lever bill it is provided:

That it is hereby made unlawful for any person to commit or permit preventable waste or deterioration of any necessaries—

Then, following on down—to enter into any contract, arrangement, or conspiracy to restrict the supply or, except as permitted by law for preventing gluts and for effecting equitable apportionment of perishable products among markets—

Where is your law for that? If you pass this section, in my judgment, without a provision for the reasonable construction of the holding clause, you absolutely prohibit, under penalty, any action which might tend to prevent gluts in the market. That is the very purpose of cold storage, aside from the selfish purpose of the owners in making a profit out of their business—and a perfectly legitimate business purpose that is. But in so far as the public are concerned, the public now are more interested than ever before in the history of this country in not only preventing gluts but in preventing waste and destruction of property. Practically the only way I know of as a business man by which you can prevent gluts is to preserve the article when it is common and cheap and hold it so that it may be distributed to points where it is wanted.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to call the Senator's attention also to the definition on pages 2 and 3 of the same bill—the Lever bill, H. R. 4630—which reads as follows, commencing with the word "Necessaries," on the bottom of page 2:

Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded, within the meaning of this act, when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirements for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time, (b) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of increasing or diminishing the price.

Then follows a proviso that it shall not apply to farmers, gardeners, and so forth.

Mr. FALL. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to the fact that in that one sentence the word "reasonable" is used, I think, five times.

I have just called attention to the provisions of section 4 of the Lever bill, which seem to contemplate that it is advisable somewhere to provide by law for the reasonable holding of products to prevent gluts; and yet, unless the word "reasonable" is written in here I do not know where else you will find it in any statute which has been enacted or any which is proposed. With the words "to hold reasonably" and "to reasonably hold," according to the amendment, then you do have a provision which can be utilized by the business men of this country to prevent gluts in the market.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, something of that sort could not be attained by providing that this prohibition should not extend to those cases in which the articles are held for such advance as may take place either in the open market, as provided by the Senator from North Dakota, or as may be held reasonable by the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. FALL. I have no doubt that some amendment of that kind would be proper; but I will say to the Senator that if the Senate intends to consider in any kindly spirit at all matters of this kind, they are embraced in what is known as the Lever bill, now pending in the House. Every provision of this kind which is imaginable, in my judgment—and I have given some careful study to it—is set forth in the so-called Lever bill, now pending. In my judgment, the whole bill provides a line of legislation which should be adopted and which necessarily must be adopted. There are some objections to it undoubtedly—some which I shall voice whenever I have an opportunity.

But to proceed with this bill, purely as instructive, on page 7 of the Lever bill it is provided:

Whenever the President shall find that any licensee has any hoarded foods, food materials, or feeds, or that any rate, charge, or practice of any licensee is unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to dispose of the hoarded foods, food materials—dispose of such hoarded foods, food materials, or feeds or discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair, or wasteful rate, charge, or practice.

And so forth. On line 11—

Now, my objection is to the use of the word "unreasonable" in this section, which provides a penalty and makes the offense a felony.

Mr. President, to read on through the Lever bill would, of course, be a useless thing at this time; but in section 7, on page 8, it is provided:

Whenever essential to prevent gluts or to effect equitable apportionment of perishable products among markets, the President or his duly authorized agents may direct the market movement or distribution of such products.

The greatest instrumentality which the business world has in the United States to prevent gluts and to effect equitable distribution of the necessaries of life is the modern cold-storage or refrigerator plant. In my judgment, under the terms of this section as proposed, unless amended, unless the Supreme Court read into it exactly what it read into the Sherman law—that is, the rule of reason—you would prohibit the conduct of business through the refrigerator or cold-storage plants of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is a very desirable amendment either in this bill or in the Lever bill.

There is a specific course of conduct followed in this country, not necessarily by loyal citizens of the United States but by others not quite within that classification. I shall not be specific about the number of the office on Wall Street, but I have it and will give it to the department or any Cabinet officer who does not already possess the information or who desires it. In a certain office on Wall Street there is a pro-German agent who is avowedly in sympathy with the German Government and its military operations. That agent has been buying on the market food supplies for many weeks, following on the declaration of war by Congress. He has bought in Chicago millions of bushels of wheat. Whether or not the wheat has ever reached any destination in Europe nobody knows. The embargo on the larger part of the German ports renders it highly probable that the product has not. In addition to that, the same agent is now on the market buying all the available beans and like articles that can be stored or kept any length of time. There is strong reason to suppose that this agent causes the food products, when it is impossible to ship them to Germany, to be taken to some convenient point along the Atlantic ports and sunk.

If a German submarine can not sink a freight steamer loaded with food products, a very certain way—and it is just as effective as the other, possibly a little more expensive in the matter of dollars and not so expensive in life—is to buy the food products through agents in this country and sink them in the Atlantic Ocean. Two purposes are thereby served. One is that it takes the food products away from ourselves and our allies; the other is that it raises the price on the market so as to exhaust more rapidly the financial resources of the allies as well as ourselves; and I think this amendment is a very necessary one. Whether it will reach the consignments from any foreign port to our own country is a matter on which we can take the chances. At least, if it is a foreign ship, if it ever lands on our shores, it must enter our harbors and be subject to our local regulations. If it is engaged in destroying food produced in our own country, it can be reached when the time for clearance papers arrives; or if a cargo belonging to our own citizens, destined for our own country, has been improperly destroyed and they have thus been deprived of their rights, the matter can be reached in that event properly.

So it is well enough, as lawyers sometimes do, it was said to-day, to take the chances on this enactment. I do not think the lawyers are quite as bad as they are painted. They are responsible for a great deal, but they are the necessary evolution of the centuries, and when there is nothing for lawyers to do they will all quit their occupation and be doing something else. The average successful lawyer is not lazy; he is not afraid of hard work; and if there is no occasion for his professional services in the country you will find him working at something else. He is a persistent sort of a fellow and very enduring, and while lawyers may do some damage in legislative bodies, upon the whole I think their influence is good.

I remember—I think I quoted it here four years ago—what I heard said by a member of a legislative body at one time some years ago. The lawyers, as usual, like this very afternoon, were debating about what a certain provision in a pending bill meant. Finally a farmer rose in great indignation and said: "What is the use of arguing the question? Everybody understands what this bill means except the lawyers." Well, ordinarily we think so. Now, we evidently have a difference of opinion here this afternoon. Nobody can tell what this measure means after it is rewritten until the courts have expounded it. Nobody knows what the Sherman law means yet, although the courts have been expounding it for many years. It is nearly 27 years, or will be this fall, since it was enacted, and probably more money has been spent and more fees paid and more arguments have been offered before the Supreme Court on that than any other one thing in this country. There has nothing been so prolific of litigation as the Sherman antitrust law, and still nobody wants to repeal it. Very many want to amend it and enlarge its powers; but it has done some good. The rule of reason was adopted by the Supreme Court and applied to various combinations supposed to be in restraint of trade or organized for the purpose of creating monopoly.

The court has been criticized a great deal for legislating instead of adjudicating, and it is barely possible that the word "reasonable" is not necessary; but it is a good deal like writing contracts in an office. If you write a contract for two men who are trying to go into a business transaction, and you write it in such a way that they immediately get into a dispute about what it means, and you are present, it is a signal to you that you had better rewrite the contract before they get out, if you are a real good lawyer, unless you want to promote litigation, and the good lawyer does not. He tries to make things plain so as not to clog the courts with business. So, in view of what has taken place this afternoon, I do not think this is any different from other transactions, even if lawyers do not agree on it; but let us write it so that it will be as plain as possible. After that is done, after human ingenuity and the powers of human language have exhausted themselves, there will still be plenty for the lawyers to do and cases for the courts to adjudicate.

Some of the plainest laws in the world have given rise to adjudications of the most vexatious character, with a divided court or a five-to-four decision. So we can take this section for whatever it may be worth. The amendment that is proposed—and I say this with all proper respect for the committee; I do not think it was their purpose entirely, or perhaps not at all, either to restrict or to destroy the various exchanges of the country dealing in provisions and grain—but whatever the purpose may have been, whether in whole or in part or at all, the necessary effect of this committee amendment is to destroy the grain exchanges of the United States, to destroy them for legitimate purposes, to destroy them not merely for the gambling purposes that have been criticized, and properly so, in this Chamber, but to destroy them for every purpose, legitimate and illegitimate.

Grain transactions where there is to be an actual delivery of the product dealt in are not for future purposes, simply to be settled by differences on the market—which is a mere wager transaction at all times—but far the reverse. The course of business is for a grain dealer, a dealer in packed meats, or a dealer in canned merchandise of any kind, preserving perishable products, to take a warehouse certificate. When perishable products are stored in a cold-storage warehouse there are warehouse certificates issued for the storer, as in other cases. The cold-storage warehouseman does not own the merchandise that is stored there. Ninety-nine per cent of it, nearly, in my part of the country, is owned by people who store it in the warehouse, just as a grain man stores his grain in a grain warehouse and pays so much per month for the storage and preservation, just as in the case supposed by one of the Senators a while ago. A man has a quantity of apples. The owner of the orchard can go to the cold-storage warehouse with his barreled apples and store them, if he desires; if not, he can sell them to an apple dealer, and the apple dealer will store them and take the chances on a rise or a fall in the market. In that case it is a preservative process; it is not a destructive one. It is for the express purpose not alone of preventing a glut on the market, when apples will go down to 5 or 15 cents a bushel—I have seen that a good many times in the apple country—but it is to preserve the articles themselves, that otherwise would be destroyed.

Why, we ought to thank the cold-storage warehousemen of this country, or the persons who discovered that process, for delivering us from the day of dried apples. We are living in a green-apple period—a healthful product. I want to promote that process. The more cold-storage warehouses we have in the country, the less margin of waste in every perishable product. Away out in parts of the western country the tomato crop went to waste last year. We could not get any help. We could not get cans. The capacity of the canning factories was overtaxed, and so acre upon acre went to waste. Apples went to waste by the thousands and thousands of bushels, because there was no help, no place to take them, no evaporating factory or process by which they could be canned and preserved.

All of these articles are dealt in by the warehouse-certificate plan. If I buy 10,000 bushels of wheat or a million bushels of wheat, the evidence of my purchase, when delivery day comes, is not by having a number of cars or some other vehicle of transportation deliver me the wheat. That is stored long ago. It is in the warehouses of Duluth or Chicago. The warehouse certificate is indorsed; it is negotiable, and the title passes by the proper process of delivery. The holders of warehouse certificates are prima facie entitled to that much grain of that grade in the warehouse.

Now, when the transfer of the grain is made by warehouse certificate I am the owner of it and I am the holder of it, under the language of this amendment. I am the holder of that much grain. Ordinarily, how long I hold it is a matter in my discretion. If I have paid for it or have arranged credit, I can hold it at discretion, under existing law. There is no limit on the quantity I can acquire, except my ability to pay for it, under existing law. I can buy and pay for as many million bushels as I have the credit or cash to do so. Now, I think that under this bill, in the case of either perishable products or grains of a more permanent character, or packed meats, salted or canned, in some way so that they are capable of being held, the safe place to stop is to say that when the dealer or holder of warehouse certificates begins to acquire or hold for the purposes of a monopoly or in restraint of trade it is time for the law to seize it.

It is objected that that is already the law under the antitrust provision referred to, the act of 1890, with its amendments. Nobody can tell whether that applied to cold-storage warehouses or not. It was an innovation. They have come since 1890. We can apply it specifically to those products, because it is in those products more than anything else that the troubles occur. It is in eggs; it is in fruit, canned, dried, evaporated, and fresh; it is in the articles ordinarily that are classified as perishable, including fresh meat, and all those under the refrigerator process are more or less perishable and might be included under the terms of this bill.

So it seems to me that, following out the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, even if it is reenacting the Sherman law, it specifically applies 27 years after the law was enacted to a present condition, not only the war condition but the conditions that have grown up and that govern the markets of this country. It is a specific declaration that if any of these merchantable products are held for the purpose of creating a monopoly or in restraint of trade the crime is complete. Otherwise every warehouse certificate that I own of any product covered in this amendment would subject me, if I hold it for a rise in the market, to conviction of a felony. I do not think with that sort of liability warehousemen or those holding certificates in warehouses would care to go out on the market and invest their money. This bill ought to be passed, I think, in the amendment form, and finally, when we vote on it, in contemplation of the Lever bill, it ought to be constructed with that measure; and our legislation ought to be had with a view of that bill in some form finally becoming a law.

At the risk of a repetition of what I said a few days ago, the grain exchanges are a necessary element in this country. Just as certain as the grain exchanges in this country are broken up you must have a substitute. I wish to call the attention of the Senate here to the substitute that will come in place of the grain exchange, that will take the place of the commission man and the broker, all the great machinery handling the grain and provision trade of the United States after they are driven out of business under charges of felony, under such provisions as this amendment.

Who will take the place of this great collecting and distributing agency that has been built up in the last 50 or 55 years? The Government. Who will the Government be? It is handy to say it will be the Government, the Government standing as the personification of all virtues. It satisfies the passing believer that here is a remedy at once. The Government has got to take the place of it. Will the Government trust these men? Will it trust Mr. Patten? Will it trust Howard Jackson? Will it trust the men at Baltimore on the grain exchange? Will it trust the New York men who are handling it for the export trade, all of whom have their agents in every pit on the board of trade in Chicago every day that it is open? Will the Government trust them? Certainly not, because they are the fellows who caused this legislation. Therefore, the Government would not trust the men who have created the evil this legislation is designed to cure. So the Government has got to get somebody else. Whom can you get? Like every other Government operation of the kind I know anything about you will get somebody to run the Government who does not know anything about it. That is the inevitable result of every Government operation that has been undertaken that I know of outside of the legitimate functions of government which are purely public in their character. The Government never thrusts its hand into a strictly private undertaking without making the condition infinitely worse than what was sought to be cured. When they get through you have the Government running the whole grain-exchange business of the country. What kind of a pay roll will grow up? It is said they will be under the civil service. No doubt of that, and the fruit of this reform will be the same as the fruit of past reforms; the last condition of this country will be infinitely worse than the first. Still, that is the only escape if this amendment remains in its present form, because, I repeat, the grain exchanges will not escape prosecution by the Government.

Mr. BRADY. May I ask the Senator if it would meet his view if the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico shall appear after the word "of," in line 10, page 8, inserting the word "unreasonably"?

Mr. SHERMAN. In various places, following out the argument of the Senator from New Mexico, insert that word and it covers a large part of it.

Mr. BRADY. In this particular section of the bill it was not the understanding of the Agricultural Committee, as I understand it, to go so far as to close the exchanges. The only thought we had, and I believe it was the general sentiment of the committee, was to stop unreasonable speculation, just such speculation as the Senator from Illinois has given us information about, just such acts as he has described relative to destroying the necessaries of life by casting them overboard into the ocean.

Of course the Senator and I may have different views as to boards of trade. He seems to think that they are a necessary element. I may think they are a necessary evil and should be controlled. It was not the intention in this particular section to attempt in any way to close the exchanges. The object was simply to stop unreasonable cornering of the market in food products and things of that kind. In order to have the section passed in a manner so that it can be considered in conference, I believe it would be possible for us at this time to agree on something that would enable the Senator to support the section.

I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has an amendment which he intends to offer that, in his judgment, will be acceptable to many members of the committee and probably to a majority of the Senate, and at the same time would cover the point the Senator from Illinois desires to have covered. I believe it would be well at this time to permit the Senator from Washington to read the amendment that he intends to offer and see if it does not cover the point. If it does, we can have a vote on it and have the matter placed in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad, if the Senator wishes to offer an amendment designed to clear up the matter, to yield for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator from Washington read his amendment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington for the purpose of having the proposed amendment read? It can not be offered at this time, according to the understanding of the Chair, but it may be read for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only present it at the request of the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed committee amendment the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such articles in the ordinary course of business for the purpose of preserving the same and the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that. I think that reaches a very desirable territory and gives a sufficient leeway so that any honest dealer in attempting to corner the product can go out and deal on the market where it is just for legitimate purchase and sale.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say of course I have not had an opportunity to give the proposed amendment very thorough analysis, but I can see no objection to its adoption. I have no authority to accept it, but it might contribute to get us out of the present entanglement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if he is willing to add these words, "or that may be held reasonable by the Federal Trade Commission"?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course I have no control over the situation, but in my judgment that would wipe out this entire amendment to the bill that we have been debating as far as any material effect is concerned. The Federal Trade Commission already has power under the statute to prohibit unfair competition, and I infer that under that language they would consider the things which we are seeking to prohibit here as unfair competition; at least they ought to do it.

For another reason I would be opposed to it. It is that which has already been discussed to some extent by the Senator from Montana and others, the injecting into the criminal statute of the Government the word "unreasonable," making it so indefinite and so vague that it would be absolutely impossible of enforcement. It would raise at once the question in every case that was brought whether or not the acts complained of were reasonable or unreasonable, and there would be no difficulty in creating a doubt about that as to escape conviction in any case.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not particularly devoted to the use of the word "reasonable"; I realize that there may be objection to it; but I want to say this: We have a Federal Trade Commission. The Federal Trade Commission has the machinery. It has the opportunity, if Congress gives it to it, to send men into the offices of these concerns and examine their books. It seems to me we ought to use that facility which we have.

I would be perfectly willing to leave out the word "reasonable" if that was, in the opinion of the Senator, objectionable; but it seems to me we ought to use the Federal Trade Commission for some such purpose as this. The Federal Trade Commission really bestows considerable benefit upon the public by examining the books of a number of different lines of manufacture, notably recently the print-paper manufacturers. This is rather a feeble amendment, I confess, and I think the committee should add to it probably; but if the Federal Trade Commission can be empowered upon the application of anybody, either the merchants or the manufacturers themselves or anybody having a complaint, to go on and examine the books of the concern and say whether the advance is reasonable, whether the advance is justifiable, the Trade Commission, it seems to me, ought to have some way of smoothing out this matter and enabling legitimate business to continue its course so that only objectionable speculation would be interfered with by this act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska wherein is the power of the Federal Trade Commission lacking to do those things now? I understood it had it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. I think they have the power to examine where there is a specific complaint, as I recall the law. They have taken the power somewhat unto themselves; but the Federal Trade Commission have given it as an excuse in many cases that Congress has not given them the power to act.

I thought while this paragraph was up we might give to the Federal Trade Commission the power to decide whether an advance made by a creamery, a cold-storage house, or any other concern that buys products during the year and holds them for a later stage was a reasonable one, whether, on an examination of the books, it was found that they were speculators or legitimate traders. We ought to have some tribunal to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I have not read the Federal Trade Commission act lately; I think it has been about a year and a half since we passed it; but I am greatly mistaken if the Federal Trade Commission has not all the power that the Senator has now been discussing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator will recall that the Federal Trade Commission was particularly established to put a stop to unfair competition in business; that it was really put into effect for the purpose of protecting one business man from a larger business man; but the law does not give to the Federal Trade Commission the power to protect the public against unreasonable charges. Now we are facing a different proposition, whether we in the United States can limit prices or not, and it seems to me that we might here take the first step not altogether of fixing prices but limiting the advance which business men can demand for doing a business which of itself is perfectly legitimate. I believe the Federal Trade Commission ought to be brought into this paragraph in some way.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. The Chair request that the debate shall proceed in order. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I rose to state that I look at the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska as removing the uncertainty that would otherwise attach to the use of the word and would possibly meet the condition which is intended to be covered by the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico. The Senator from Nebraska tenders an amendment which reposes in the Federal Trade Commission the power of determining whether the particular acquisition or the particular storing is reasonable or unreasonable. If they say that it is reasonable, then the party has no reason to apprehend any prosecution. On the other hand, if they say that it is unreasonable, then this holding becomes criminal under the law, so that the holder or person who acquires is never in any doubt on the subject at all. That is to say, the matter is put up to the commission to decide whether the holding is reasonable or unreasonable. It occurred to me that it would rather obviate that character of objection. I might say, however, while I have the floor, that in my opinion the evil which this is intended to reach is not under the control of the Federal Trade Commission under the present law. I know of no power given to the Federal Trade Commission to reach the case of one who has gathered up in an unreasonable amount any of the commodities of the country with a view of holding them in order to enhance the price to the public. That is quite outside of what was contemplated in the passage of the act, and I can recall no provision of it that would reach the case. The real power that we gave to them over and above what had theretofore been exercised by the Bureau of Corporations was the power to regulate and control unfair competition or unfair practices in competition, as it is expressed in the statute.

The matter of driving a competitor out of business is not the idea to which this bill is directed at all. It is directed to the man who accumulates a quantity of a particular product not for the purpose of driving any competitor out of business, but for the purpose of elevating the price to the public.

I think if the Senator from Washington attends carefully to the language of the amendment tendered by the Senator from Nebraska, he will find no just cause for complaint. It seems to me that it will go far toward meeting the criticism of the bill which brought out the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico, and will likewise quite satisfactorily, as it seems to me, meet the condition suggested by the colleague of the Senator who has tendered the amendment.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. Before the Senator from Montana takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he does not feel that the Federal Trade Commission has authority under the present law to take the initiative in a case of this kind?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so at all. The Federal Trade Commission has the authority to investigate the books of corporations and see whether they are guilty of a violation of the Sherman Act.

Mr. BRADY. The answer is satisfactory to me. I wish further to ask——

Mr. WALSH. That is all the power it has. Then it simply turns the case over to the Department of Justice.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to ask the Senator whether adding the words suggested by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington would make the measure more effective?

Mr. WALSH. It would not, to my mind, make it more effective, but it would relieve a very just apprehension that might exist in some minds as to whether a man would not be guilty of a violation of the act under circumstances such as we did not intend to constitute a violation. If he has a quantity of eggs, we will say, in storage and he is apprehensive that the continued holding of those eggs would make him amenable to the act he can submit the matter to the Trade Commission, which will go in and investigate his books. They may say, "The amount you have under the circumstances is not unreasonable; we believe that you may justly carry that amount," or they may say to the man, "The amount that you have is unreasonable, and you must dispose promptly of the eggs."

Mr. BRADY. It seems to me if these words were added to the bill it would make it more effective, for the reason that we would have a tribunal already created for the purpose of determining the matter, and it would relieve all question of doubt as to the legality or ability of the Government to enforce the law.

Mr. WALSH. That was the idea I was endeavoring to express.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] would serve another useful purpose. It occurred to me since I heard the discussion of it. I remember some three years ago there came to Washington a number of coal operators in Indiana and Illinois operating in the soft coal district. At that time there was very great depression in the mining of coal. They wanted to know if there was any authority by which they could enter into a trade agreement for the production of coal and the marketing of their product within given areas. It had reached a point where it was unprofitable. They had shut down their shafts and some thousands of men in the two States were idle. It was much more profitable to the operators to close the mines than it was to operate at a loss. They came here with an agreement made by the operators on paper. They went to various departments and got no satisfaction. I finally went to the present Attorney General and asked him if there was any relief. He very frankly told me he did not feel in his department that he ought to give any advice; that these operators must make any trade agreements at their peril, and take their chances of being indicted afterwards by the grand juries in their respective districts.

That was before the enactment of the present Trade Commission law. Since the Trade Commission has been created they have served some very useful purposes. Originally the act had in contemplation only, as the Senator from Montana has said, unfair competition. That has been the greater volume of their business, their investigation, and their orders made. If we added in this amendment that the Federal Trade Commission could investigate and make certain findirgs I think it would cover the difficulty in which I found these coal operators, who were perfectly willing that their method of transacting business should be known to the Government or anybody. They only wanted a chance to operate and live without consuming their principal. If the Federal Trade Commission made an order I think it would relieve any man indicted who transacts business in accordance with that order from any chance of being convicted of a felony under this section. No jury would convict a man who was indicted if the Trade Commission had authorized the transaction on which he was indicted.

I think it furnishes a reasonably adequate security to a business man who wants to do business legitimately to have the finding of the commission back of him before he expends his money and embarks in any given enterprise. It has that very useful feature to it; and that, taken with the amendment of the Senator from Washington, makes the section approach very nearly to being a workable provision.

What I am thinking about here more than anything else is not merely the consumer who, of course, is an ever-present quantity as long as there is anything to consume. If we do not look out in this country, at the gait we are traveling and with the kind of legislation we are considering, there will be an empty market for the consumer. What I am thinking about is the paramount question of how to promote the safety and induce the highest volume of production on the part of the farmer and other producers of the country. The rest of it is merely the handling machinery that intervenes between the producer and the consumer; that is, the grain exchange, the railroad company, the express company, the cold-storage warehouse, the grain warehouse, and all the other intermediate agencies, which I think ought to be regulated; but not one of them engaged in a legitimate business ought to be hampered in its activities, because it serves a very useful as well as a vitally necessary purpose. If this can be so arranged that it does not destroy the grain exchanges, I regard that of all the days in the year, outside of Sundays, there are never more than two or three days when a flurry comes that any grain exchange ought to be closed in the public interest. It happens sometimes. If they are closed the rest of the time there will occur inevitably a derangement of the methods of doing business, a dislocation of the methods of transmitting from the producer to the consumer the necessary food products. If that be done, instead of a reform it will be worse than the condition from which we are seeking to escape.

So I think this amendment ought to be made in such a way finally that the grain exchanges and other provision exchanges shall not be interfered with. If that can be done, I shall gladly support a section of this kind. Otherwise I shall be compelled to vote against this and all similar provisions, because to me a grain exchange, while it may be regulated, ought not to be destroyed. I am perfectly willing for my part to lodge in any department, or with the President acting with a board of directors, the grain exchanges, and whenever there is joint action deciding that the grain exchange shall be suspended to have it say so. Ordinarily the President or his representative will be the dominant force of the board of directors of every grain exchange in the country, and when the reasons are sufficient he would rule the conduct of that joint board.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to have read as a part of my remarks a clipping from the Kansas Mail and Breeze which has just been sent me, and which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ALL IN DISTRIBUTION.

A subscriber in Texas (N. C. Myers, of San Benito, Tex.) sends me an editorial clipped from the Houston Chronicle on the subject of food conservation and distribution. It reads:

"Perhaps the greatest problem for this section of the country is distribution and conservation. We experience little difficulty in producing vast quantities of foodstuffs, but the climate makes them hard to keep. Unless they are shipped to the market promptly or are stored in refrigerating plants, they perish in a very short time. It has been estimated that three-fifths of the garden truck raised in Texas never reaches the consumer. This is not only hard on the people who need and could use it but it is an injustice to the farmer. Just now beans and tomatoes are coming on. The local markets are glutted with them, but there is plenty of room in the North. As a matter of fact, many acres of these valuable vegetables will rot because of the lack of marketing facilities and distributing agencies. It does little good to produce unless the products reach their legitimate destination. Distribution and conservation mean everything to agriculture as well as to the consumer. They comprehend more than trained service and waybills. They comprehend the proper sorting and packing, the proper refrigeration, and the proper unloading on the market. Before the United Fruit Co. took hold of the banana market it was uncertain and fluctuating, even to a greater extent than is the vegetable market to-day. Bananas were sometimes 5 cents apiece and sometimes 5 cents a dozen. Now the banana market is not only remarkably steady but the distributing facilities have been so arranged that villages of the interior can get the fruit at all times of the year at about the same price as the larger cities, and the change in price from one season to another is remarkably small. The same thing could be done with beans, tomatoes, lettuce, cucumbers, and other vegetables were the same efficient system to be applied. The establishing of such a system is, we believe, one of the greatest needs of this section and, for that matter, of the whole country."

Following this, Mr. Myers gives the following chapter from his own experience:

"I am sending you a clipping out of a recent copy of the Houston Chronicle. I think it contains a good deal of truth. At present the Government is trying to get the farmers and the truck growers to increase their acreage. At the present writing I have more than 200 bushels of fine green string beans in the field ready to pick. But when I asked the price to-day several buyers said they thought they could pay about 60 cents a bushel for them. The seed that I planted for this crop cost me $15 a bushel. The labor cost 85 cents a day. Then, when the beans were ready to pick I had to pay 12½ cents for the empty hamper and 20 cents to get the beans picked. So, you see, when the seed, water, labor, containers, and the like are figured in, a trucker can barely break even at 60 cents a bushel.

"It is the same way with the cabbage. Only last week I received a letter from a relative in Ohio who said cabbage was retailing at 15 cents a pound, or $300 a ton. The same day that the letter was written I sold some cabbage at the rate of $50 a ton. I can not see where the extra $250 a ton comes in. If the Government would manage it some way so that the truck would go directly from the grower to the consumer, things would be better for both the grower and the consumer.

"N. C. MYERS,

"SAN BENITO, TEX."

Mr. Myers touches on the great unsolved problem, so far as the food supply is concerned. It is not, after all, so much a matter of production as of distribution. If the farmer can be assured of a steady and profitable market he will take care of the production end of the problem in very fair order, but when he is urged to increase his production and knows from past experience that when he has produced a crop he is liable to have it left on his hands for want of facilities for transporting it to market, or that, if he does get it to market he will get a price that leaves him no margin of profit, it is difficult to work up any enthusiasm on his part in the matter of production.

In my opinion, the remedy lies in efficient organization and cooperation of the producers along the line perhaps of the fruit-growers' associations on the Pacific coast. The Ohio consumers of cabbage, for example, would be delighted to pay $100 a ton for Mr. Myers's cabbage, and they should get them for that and at the same time allow Mr. Myers to get a better price for them than he can get under the present arrangement. Increased food production is not going to solve this problem unless it is coupled with an efficient and economical system of distribution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is my purpose to take but a few minutes of the time of the Senate. I know the chairman of the committee is very anxious to get a vote upon this bill; but this clipping was sent me by a constituent with the request that I might have it read, and at the same time suggesting that he believed it would throw some light upon present conditions.

One of the greatest and most important problems which we will be called upon to meet is that of the production, distribution, and conservation of foodstuffs, and our people should take every precaution against food shortage.

We have ample for the needs of our own people until the next harvest, and there will be some to spare, and there will likely be a good surplus this year; but unless an extra effort is made we may face a shortage next year, and therefore everything should be done that can be to encourage an increase in the production of food supplies.

It seems to me that the Government has shown a lamentable indifference to the importance of the agricultural industry. Farmers have often produced large crops, but because of the lack of proper methods of distribution, the failure of the department to inform the producers of the different sections of the country as to the needs of the people of other sections, and the failure to properly standardize and grade the most important products, the speculators have reaped the profits, while the farmer has hardly made expenses.

The farmers and stock raisers have been troubled by the problems of the distribution of their products for many years. If they could reach the ultimate consumer more directly, there would be much less complaint.

While it is true that they have been receiving high prices for their products since the beginning of the war in August, 1914, yet it is equally true that they have not had the full benefit of the high prices which have been paid over the country for their products when purchased for the family table. If you desire a larger acreage cultivated, you must let the producer know that his products will be taken at fair and reasonable prices, and that he and the consumers, and not the speculator, will derive the benefit from such production.

There are millions of acres of uncultivated lands in this country which would be turned into productive fields if the producers knew there would be a reasonable demand for the products the land would yield.

Those who enact the laws and those who issue the rules and regulations must be fair to the farmers and stock raisers; they must know and fully realize what chances those producers must take, because the farmer and stock raiser alone must bear the loss of short crops and the loss of stock by disease. Then, if there is an overproduction, they must stand the loss brought about by an overstocked market.

In war times they must pay much higher prices for everything they buy than they ever paid before. In such times they lose a large number of their best farm hands. These men are called from the grain fields to the training camps, the trenches, and the battle fields, and in many instances it is impossible to fill their places on the farms.

I am told that already this year in one small county in western Kansas some 15,000 acres of wheat have been abandoned and that it will be impossible to plant other crops because of the shortage of farm hands, a large number of the young men having enlisted in the Army.

While it is true that the people of this country are dependent upon the farmer and stock raiser for much of their food supply, yet it is equally true that these producers are not the beneficiaries of the present very high prices nor are they responsible for present high cost of living.

Mr. Hoover told the people of New York that the present prices of flour can be reduced 40 to 50 per cent and at the same time the producers be treated in a liberal manner, and he advocates measures of food control. He says:

> Large measures of food control do not mean arbitrary interference with the necessary economic machinery of trade. They mean that every branch be called in by the Government and forge themselves into a link from which the contemplated chain will protect the producer, legitimate distributor, and consumer."

The Washington Star, in an editorial in Sunday's issue, among other things, says:

> Speculation in foodstuffs is one of the most grievous evils of the day. The whole process of food material speculation is wrong and tends to increase the price to the consumer without any economic necessity.

A committee appointed by the District Commissioners for the purpose of investigating the supply of food in the District of Columbia reported, among other things:

> Prices demanded for many staple food products here, as well as in other cities of the country, were unusually high.

Again, they say:

> In the opinion of the committee, the element of speculation in food products has been one of the potent factors in the enormous increase in the prices which consumers have been compelled to pay. Investigation by the Federal authorities seems to establish this fact.

Those who are sending out from Washington the scare notices about food supplies should be bridled, for they give the unscrupulous dealer an excuse for increasing the prices.

A Kansas merchant was in Washington a few days ago and told me that some of his customers purchased much larger quantities of a certain article than before. When he told them there was no shortage in the supply and it was sufficient for the demands and there was no danger of the price going up, they told him they had read in the paper that there would probably be a shortage. He told me he visited the office of the local newspaper and asked about the article and was told that it had been sent out from Washington.

The Government officials have been suggesting that the farmer be helped by sending boys from the town to assist in the work on the farm, but I submit that this would be but little help at first, especially if the boys were inexperienced in farm work. If there is need for greater planting now why would it not have been wiser to recommend that the young men at the agricultural colleges who know something about farming be allowed their credits if they would go home and help plant and harvest the crops? One of my constituents wrote me that one young man of experience from the agricultural college would be worth 20 boys who knew nothing about farm work.

There are many ways to increase the production of food supply, but the Members of the Senate know them and there is no need of discussing them.

The farmers, their wives, sons, and daughters are anxious to join in the movement to conserve the food supply and to increase the production for the future, for they fully realize the conditions which now confront the people and they are ready and willing to do their full share in the present crisis; but they do not care to be left "holding the bag." The farmers have always been loyal to the Government. When they have been asked to do their part in the past they have quickly responded, and they will do their full share now and in the future. The country can safely depend upon the loyalty of the men and women on the farms of this country.

Mr. KENYON. I ask what amendment is now pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I think we could now vote on that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will be voted down, for, if adopted, it will ruin the entire provision. It will simply leave the matter in a state of absolute wilderness of conflicting opinion as to what is reasonable and what is unreasonable, whereas the amendment as proposed now is, I think, as definite as can possibly be expressed in language, namely, storing, acquiring, holding, or making away with, with the intent to affect the market price or to limit the supply thereof to the public. I fail to see how that could be made more definite.

Mr. KENYON. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] now be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I will offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which embraces the amendment of the Senator from Washington, with several additional words, which I trust he will accept.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us see whether or not the Senator from Washington accepts the amendment as modified.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to hear it read. I do not know what the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I propose is really the amendment of the Senator from Washington with certain words added.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Nebraska propose to add the words which he submitted to me?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Let the amendment be read, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think it would be very well if the Secretary should read the amendment as proposed to be modified by the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Secretary is about to do.

The SECRETARY. Mr. HITCHCOCK proposes the following amendment:

> Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business, and the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market, or as may be held reasonable by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment. I should like to say one word upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. The effect of that amendment would be that everybody who is hoarding food and speculating in food would apply, with such ex parte showing as he was able to get together as to the reasonableness of what he was doing from his standpoint, to the Federal Trade Commission for a permit—that is what it would practically amount to—or for an order declaring that it was reasonable. If the matter is going to be referred back to the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission as to the extent to which people may speculate in food supplies this provision ought to be discarded entirely and a new one drawn and expressed in that way. The Federal Trade Commission already has extensive powers. Those powers may not cover all acts attempted to be prohibited by this amendment, but the commission have more power than they have exercised; and to give them the additional power of allowing food speculators to hoard foodstuffs so long as the Federal Trade Commission says under the circumstances it is reasonable to do so, it seems to me, would be taking a long, long step in the enlargement of the powers of that commission. I myself do not think, in view of the experience the country has had and the complaints that have been made against those alleged to be profiting on the necessities of the people, on foodstuffs and fuel, that we ought to put it in the discretion of anybody to say, while the country is confronted with a great emergency, that men may be licensed or may obtain an order to store foodstuffs for the purpose of limiting the supply and increasing the price to the people who need them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will attend, I have before me the amendment that has been offered, and I ask the Senator from Washington, if he has a draft of it before him, whether the word "and" should not be "for"? It reads as follows:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business and the sale thereof at such price—

And so on, and so on.

Up to the present time the law does not say a word about the sale of these things, and we ought not, it seems to me, to inject the sale feature into the proviso, but merely provide that it shall not extend to "the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business for the sale thereof at such price as may prevail," and so forth.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no objection, Mr. President, to the substitution of the word "for" for the word "and." I offer the amendment now that I have sent to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to make a further inquiry of the Senator. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent at present, tendered an amendment which, as I caught it, covered the same ground, and I thought we ought not to pass this question without attention to the amendment tendered by him. I think, however, the language of the amendment tendered by the Senator from Washington is substantially like that suggested in the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment tendered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from North Dakota, who has offered an amendment, is not present, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hitchcock	McLean	Smith, Md.
Brady	Hollis	Martin	Smoot
Calder	Husting	Page	Sterling
Cummins	James	Penrose	Stone
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Poindexter	Sutherland
Fall	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Thomas
Fletcher	Kellogg	Ransdell	Trammell
France	Kenyon	Reed	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Knox	Shafroth	Walsh
Gerry	La Follette	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	McCumber	Shields	Wolcott
Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ga.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Washington has just offered an amendment, which is the pending question. Am I right?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska offered it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho will state it.

Mr. BRADY. Some time ago there was an amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and I understand it to be the same amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I desire to know upon which amendment we will be called to vote at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the amendment was originally offered by the Senator from Washington it was not in order, the pending amendment then being an amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico. That amendment has now been disposed of, and the Senator from Nebraska has just offered the amendment. The Chair assumes it is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. The Secretary will state it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Washington had intended to offer this amendment, or the substance of it, and inasmuch as the portion which I have added is controversial and likely to take up a good deal of time, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment I have offered and permit the Senator from Washington or the Senator from North Dakota to tender the amendments they desire to offer.

Mr. MCCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question before he proceeds.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator offers his amendment, which I infer is somewhat of the same nature as the one suggested by the Senator from Nebraska and withdrawn, I should like to inquire whether if the word "affecting," in line 10, were changed to "enhancing" it would not do much to solve the difficulty, the language of the clause being—

Or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price.

My suggestion is that changing the word "affecting" to "enhancing" might do away with the difficulty the Senator has in mind.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, allow me to say that I do not think it would dispose of the difficulty. In the case of a man buying up, for instance, eggs in the month of June in considerable quantity for the purpose of storing and selling them at a better price in the wintertime, when eggs are scarce, I can not imagine how he could buy in any considerable quantity without naturally enhancing the value or the price of the eggs that he does not buy. Inasmuch as that needed to be made clear, I introduced my amendment; but since that time the Senator from Washington has offered another amendment which means exactly the same thing as the amendment which was offered by me, and which I think is a little more concise and in a little better langauge, and will effectuate the same purpose. That amendment reads:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business for the purpose of preserving the same, and the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market.

I think it is in better langauge and better expressed than the amendment which I offered; and I was going to suggest that I would withdraw mine, and support the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Washington proposes to add, at the end of the committee amendment, in line 18, after the word "act," the following:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business for the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator who is the author of this amendment practically the same question that was asked by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The latter part of the amendment offered by the Senator applies to the sale. There is nothing in the section itself relating to the sale. Why not drop out the clause "or the sale thereof in a free, unrestricted market"? It would certainly be in the nature, to my mind, of clearness. It is the same suggestion made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that words "free, unrestricted market" are quite essential if we are going to adopt this amendment at all. I offered the amendment rather as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. I do not believe I have made the Senator understand me, and I do not think the Senator from Montana was fortunate enough to quite get the point to him, and I will take a few words to state it.

The section provides, speaking briefly, now, in an abbreviated form:

That any person carrying on * * * commerce among the several States * * * in any article suitable for human food * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold * * * any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price * * * shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Now, that section says nothing about selling. It does not undertake to regulate the selling price at all. It relates to the storing of the thing or the holding of the thing for the purpose of enhancing the price, but it does not relate to the selling of an article.

I suggest that if the Senator were to offer his amendment in this form—

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business—

It would then absolutely fit on to the provisions of the section which it is proposed to amend; but when you add the words—

for the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market—

You introduce into your proviso an element which is not in the body of the section itself, and I think to a certain extent you make the language doubtful.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that that is, to a certain extent at any rate, embraced in the term "holding"? That is, the man holds for sale.

Mr. REED. No; I do not think it is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He certainly would not store it and hold it for any other purpose except for disposing of it in the market at a price.

Mr. REED. He might and he might not. I do not agree with the Senator. I do not think these words belong in there at all—

For the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, that is the essential part of the amendment, as I understand it. If that part is stricken out, the remainder of it ought to be stricken out altogether. Selling in an open, unrestricted market, for such price as may prevail in that kind of a market, is the idea that is intended to be conveyed by the amendment; and it was offered on account of the strenuous arguments that have been made here throughout the day that the amendment proposed by the committee would interfere with any kind of storing whatever, because a man would not know what the price was going to be, and if the price happened to be better when he sold it than when he stored the article he would be amenable to the provisions of this amendment, and subject to imprisonment in the penitentiary if the jury found him guilty. But if you should take the first half of the amendment, as the Senator from Missouri proposes, and authorize the storing and the holding in the ordinary course of business, I think it would so qualify the amendment of the committee as to render it almost useless.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is little to be gained by undertaking to analyze this language; but simply that my own position may be plain, I make this remark in passing.

I think when you put in the language of this proviso which I now read—

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding such article in the ordinary course of business—

You introduce uncertainty into the statute, rather than certainty. When you add to that the clause—

For the sale thereof at such price as may prevail in a free, unrestricted market—

You have this contradictory, and I think almost absurd, situation: You start out in the main clause of the law prohibiting the storing or acquiring or holding of food for the purpose of affecting the market price. Having entirely prohibited doing a thing for the purpose of affecting the market price, you proceed to say that that language shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. POINDEXTER. For sale in an unrestricted market.

Mr. REED. The words "acquiring * * * in the ordinary course of business for * * * sale * * * in an * * * unrestricted market" are now to be added, which I think would only introduce further uncertainty. I do not believe, Mr. President, that the amendment ought to be adopted to the section. Let me say just this one word:

I have examined the amendment with a good deal of care, because it was before the committee in the form of a separate bill offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]; and as I read that language, it has no ambiguity in it at all, unless you say the same ambiguity exists in all of the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the amendments thereto. The reading of this section, when you strip it of all qualifying phrases and come to the direct language of the statute, amounts to this. It reads:

That any person carrying on * * * commerce among the several States * * * in any article suitable for human food * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold * * * any such article for the purpose of * * * affecting the market price * * * shall be deemed guilty of felony.

Now, notice, you must acquire it or hold it for the purpose of affecting the market price. That must be your object. That must be your design. That must be the thing you have in mind. The statute would not cover the incidental raising of value or market price which comes through the mere fact that an individual buys some article upon the market—that incidental rise which always comes whenever there is trading in an article. The statute would not cover that kind of an act at all. The statute will cover the act of a man who deliberately goes out and buys a thing having in his mind the purpose of raising the price—that is all it will cover—or the man who gets hold of a lot of things and holds them for the purpose of sending up the price.

An illustration will make this perfectly plain. I believe that wheat next month is going to be $2 a bushel. I find that on the market to-day it is only $1.50 a bushel. I am simply illustrating, of course. I go and buy a thousand bushels of wheat and put it in a granary, expecting the benefit of that rise. I do not buy the wheat to force up the price. I buy the wheat because I believe the price is going up. I look ahead. I see a crop shortage, possibly, or I see a great demand, and I say, "I believe it is going up," and I go and buy a thousand bushels of wheat, not for the purpose of sending up the market, but because I believe it is going up.

Now, that act would not come within this law. But suppose, on the other hand, I do what Mr. Patten did a few years ago. Suppose I go out with the purpose of sending the price of wheat very high, and I proceed to buy wheat in vast quantities, my object being now to take wheat which is a dollar a bushel and force it up to $2 a bushel. I buy a great quantity of wheat, so that I control the supply. My purpose there is to force up the price, not to profit by a natural rise in the market, but to force the market itself—to rig the market, to control the market, to boom the market, to corner the market.

If the Senator who drew this amendment and offered it originally as a separate bill were to have studied for may days, I do not believe he could have gotten more fortunate language, and I think every word we add to it detracts from it.

The language is not dissimilar from that employed in those general terms found in the Sherman Act. Notice section 2 of the Sherman Act:

Every person who shall monopolize or attempt to monopolize or combine or conspire with any other person to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the States—

And so forth.

That is very general language, and the same objections were raised then that are being raised now; but the court, in construing it, said:

What is the purpose of the act? Was it the purpose of the act to say that a man who went out here and bought some goods that he was going to sell to somebody else, and ship them in commerce, and incidentally control that many goods, was engaged in monopolizing to the small extent that he got control of goods?

The courts answer that question in the negative, and said that there must be a purpose on the part of the person who bought goods to monopolize; and they left the purpose, the intent, the controlling factor in the decision.

So it is with reference to the clause "in restraint of trade." Everybody knows that when a man goes into the market and buys any simple article, even 50 bushels of wheat, and puts it in his bin, he has to that extent restrained trade in that 50 bushels of wheat. He has stopped trade in it. But, Mr. President, the courts have no difficulty with that; they construe the words "restraint of trade" to cover that class of conduct where the individual or combination of individuals or corporations start out with a design to get control of the trade; and they have held universally that the individual transaction carried on by the individual for the mere purpose of ordinary trade was not restraint of trade, although there was an incidental restraint necessarily in every transaction.

I think it would be very wise if the Senator who offered this amendment, which stood here clean-cut, and I believe in splendid form, would allow it to stand, except that I think the words "affecting the price" ought to be changed to "enhancing the price."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Missouri has said. I think the amendment of the committee is complete and sufficient; and while I offered this amendment to it, I did it in order to avoid what seemed to me to be worse amendments than it is—one prepared by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—as a sort of a compromise proposition to meet the objections that have been urged against the amendment of the committee.

If the addition which I propose in this amendment is going down, it will be entirely satisfactory to me. I agree with everything the Senator has said as to the definiteness and clearness of the offense which is attempted to be defined in the amendment as it was reported by the committee.

I ask leave to print, as a part of my remarks, without reading, the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Rept. No. 47, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 315) to punish the storing of foodstuffs for the purpose of cornering the market, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it back to the Committee on the Judiciary with the recommendation that the bill be favorably reported to the Senate, with amendments:

* * * * * * *

So that the bill as amended shall read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation, or a member of a partnership, carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or enhancing the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years."

The subcommittee conferred with the assistant to the Attorney General, G. C. Todd, who, at the request of the subcommittee, prepared a statement upon the bill, as follows:

"Speculation in foodstuffs and other necessaries of life is generally thought to be one of the contributing causes of the present abnormally high prices. The object of this bill, shortly stated, is to prevent such speculation.

"The existing law is adequate to reach combinations or agreements, the purpose or effect of which is to increase prices or curtail supplies. It also reaches a single person or corporation who monopolizes or attempts to monopolize trade or commerce in an article.

"It is doubtful, however, to say the least, whether the existing law covers the case of a dealer who, on his own initiative and without combination with others, purchases produce and withholds it from the market under circumstances which justify the inference that his purpose is to enhance prices, but whose purchases and holdings, taken alone, are not sufficient in quantity to make out a case of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize. While such a course of dealing on the part of a single trader may not be sufficient to affect the market price, when pursued by a large number of dealers acting on a common impulse the effect is the same as if these dealers had entered into a combination to enhance prices."

The purpose of the present bill is to provide a certain punishment for this class of cases, to which, as stated above, the existing law is at least of doubtful application. The subcommittee is aware, of course, that there may be difficulties in the enforcement of the law and as to proof in particular cases. If, however, the acts against which the bill is aimed are wrongful, difficulties of administration should not be allowed to stand in the way of its enactment.

It may be said to be a matter of common knowledge that speculators and dealers throughout the country are taking advantage of the present economic situation, the difficulties of transportation, and the state of war in which the country now is, to extort unreasonable profits from consumers in food, fuel, and other necessaries of life.

In the Washington (D. C.) Times of April 27, 1917, the following statement was published:

"A national convention of food consumers has been called to meet in Washington by J. W. Roberts, president of the National Food Consumers' Relief League of America.

"It is the announced purpose to make 'unscrupulous' dealers in food disclose their stocks, so the poor will not suffer and that those who are barely able to buy will not be mulcted.

"In his call to consumers to rally to Washington, Mr. Roberts says:

"'At the earnest solicitation of those who wish cheaper food, I, as president of the National Food Consumers' League of America, hereby issue a call for a nation-wide convention of delegates and consumers of food products to meet in the city of Washington, D. C., at high noon on Sunday, May 13, 1917, for the purpose of devising ways and means whereby the high cost of food may be materially reduced.

"'Every county in every State is entitled to five delegates; at least one should be sent.

"'We are face to face with the most gigantic undertaking of the present century. No other fact is half as momentous as the one of food. Speculators and unscrupulous men have taken advantage of a condition that existed only in the mind and cornered the food to the hurt and detriment of the Nation. These men should be brought to terms. Millions of dollars' worth of food is hidden away in warehouses and cold storage, and other millions have been dumped into rivers in order that the high prices may be maintained, thus not only robbing those who can pay, but in this way starving many helpless women and children.'"

In the long period of exceeding prosperity which the country has generally enjoyed there was such abundance on all sides that the idea of actual want or shortage of the necessaries of life to those who were reasonably prudent and industrious received but little attention. It is true that abuses of speculation in staple articles of food or necessary supplies of fuel were flagrant in some cases and caused much dissatisfaction in the public mind. The evil, however, was not of such a vital and widespread nature as to call for the revival and strict application of the old common law against such offenses. In the days when the common law was taking its form in England the people were poorer, modes of life were simpler, and any tampering with the necessary articles of life for the purpose of pure speculation, without the rendering of any necessary service in exchange for the profits obtained, was a matter of vital concern. The offenses of "forestalling" and "engrossing" were well-defined crimes punishable at the common law along with monopoly, cheating, and other offenses against fair trade. Some of the acts which in the ancient common law constituted forestalling and engrossing are more or less obsolete or have lost their significance, but the general tenor and purport of the common law and many of the specific acts constituting forestalling and engrossing were identical with those punishable under the present bill.

In a paper prepared by the Library of Congress the following definitions are given:

"Forestalling, commonly speaking, means to market before the public, or to anticipate or prevent the public market; but legally understood it has a greater signification, for it comprehends all unlawful endeavors to enhance the price of any commodity, and all practices which have an apparent tendency thereto, such as spreading false rumors, buying commodities in the market before the accustomed hour, buying and selling again the same articles in the same market, and other such criminal devices. It also comprehended the offenses of regrating and ingrossing, but the names "regrator" or "ingrosser" were not known before the reign of Henry III. (3 Inst., 195, 196; 1 Hawk. P. Cor., c. 80; Brown Indict., 40; Cromp., p. 80b.)

"No attempt of this kind can be looked upon in any other light than as an offense against the public, as it apparently tends to put a check upon trade, to the general inconvenience of the people, by putting it out of their power to supply themselves with any commodity, unless at an unreasonable expense, which often proves extremely oppressive to the poorer sort and can not but give just cause of complaint even to the richest. (Hawkins, P. C., 234.)

"If a person within the realm buys any merchandise in gross and sells the same again in gross, it is an offense of this nature, for by this means the price will be enhanced, because passing through several hands each will endeavor to make his profit by it (3 Inst., 196), and if such practices were allowable a rich man might ingross into his hands a whole commodity and then sell it again at what price he should think fit, which is of such dangerous consequences that the bare ingrossing of an entire commodity, with an intent to sell it again at an unreasonable price, is an offense indictable at the common law whether any part thereof be sold by the ingrosser or not. (Cro. Car., 231, 232, Hawk., P. C.)

"But any merchant, whether he be a subject or a foreigner, bringing victuals or any other merchandise into the realm, may sell the same in gross, but the purchaser can not sell the same in gross, for then he is an ingrosser, according to the strict sense of the word, and may be indicted thereof at the common law. (3 Inst., 195; Hales, P. C., 152; resolved by all the judges, 39 and 40 Eliz.)

"[Source: Illingworth, William. An inquiry into the laws, ancient and modern, respecting forestalling, regrating, and ingrossing. London, 1800. pp. 14–15.]

"Regrator: 'Forestaller' is he that buyeth corne, cattell, or other merchandize whatsoever is saleable, by the way as it commeth to Markets, Faires, or such like places to bee sold, to the intent that he may sell the same againe at a more high and deer price, in prejudice and hurt of the common wealth and people. (Termes de la Ley, Forestaller.)

"'Regrator' is he that hath corn, victuals or other things sufficient for his owne necessary need, occupation or spending, and doth nevertheless, ingrosse and buy up into his hands more corne, victuals, or other such things, to the intent to sell the same againe at a higher and deerer price, in faires, markets or other such like places, whereof see the stat. 5 E. 6, c. 14, for he shall be punished as a forestaller." (Termes de la Ley, Regrator.)

"[Source: Stroud, F. The Judicial Dictionary, London, 1890, p. 664.]"

These offenses are particularly heinous in time of war and at a time when there is danger of a world-wide shortage of food and the possible famine of millions. Speculation and profiting by the necessities and hunger of the people in such a time can not be too severely punished. During the Revolution Washington gave vent to his indignation against forestallers and foregatherers and expressed the opinion that the penalty of death was not too extreme in such cases and under such conditions.

The present bill makes the offense a felony, punishable by imprisonment, and leaves no alternative penalty of fine or otherwise, but makes imprisonment "for not less than six months nor more than three years" mandatory upon conviction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 8, line 19, after the word "act," to insert "except section 8"; and in line 24, after the word "than," to strike out "one" and insert "the beginning of the next fiscal," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of this act, except section 8, shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill in the form of a new section. It is really a bill that was reported by the Committee on Fisheries, upon which they had hearings, and I believe the committee were in favor of the bill. It gives authority to the Secretary of Commerce to arrange for the hatching of fish and putting the fish upon the market. Perhaps the amendment had better be read, and then I will submit a few remarks upon it by way of explaining it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct such operations in the United States, including Alaska, as may be necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods employed in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods; and to increase the consumption thereof; and to take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals; and to do any and all things necessary and convenient for carrying out the purposes of this act.

That for the said purposes the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hire, charter, rent, or purchase buildings and lands, vessels, and fishing gear, and any and all equipment necessary or convenient for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; to employ all persons necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; to purchase, either in the open market or in competitive bids, such supplies as may be necessary; and to buy and sell fishes and other aquatic food animals, either fresh or cured: Provided, That the proceeds of any sales shall be accounted for and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

That for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this act, including the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office, there shall be appropriated a sum not to exceed $250,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have here a letter from the Secretary of Commerce, written to the late chairman of the Committee on Fisheries, which explains this amendment. I should like to have the Secretary read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 8, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, transmitting a copy of S. 2144 with request for a detailed report thereon.

The general purpose of this bill is most commendable, and is in line with recommendations that the department has already made to Congress and with accomplished facts in the department's campaign for the greater utilization of aquatic food products. Having in view the conditions which are becoming more acute and aggravated, the department, on December 28, 1916, submitted an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $50,000 for the fiscal year 1917, "for introducing through the Bureau of Fisheries new fish and other aquatic foods" (see H. Doc. No. 1871, 64th Cong., 2d sess.). This item failed of passage in the last Congress, and has been recommended to the present Congress (see H. Doc. No. 72, 65th Cong., 1st sess.). The present bill, however, is of much wider scope than the other measures referred to, and confers such large and hitherto unexercised powers that very careful consideration is demanded.

The two essential features of the bill are (1) that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to develop new aquatic sources of food and to bring about the fuller utilization of sources not now adequately utilized, and (2) that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to engage in the business of catching, curing, transporting, and marketing such fishes and other aquatic food products.

In respect to the first-named feature of the bill, I wish to make a very hearty indorsement. There is a large and most inviting field now awaiting exploitation, and, from the very nature of the case, Government initiative and aid are required in order that prompt and effective development of neglected water resources may be induced. A publicity campaign of the broadest character, in conjunction with work of actual demonstration of the availability, utility, and commercial possibility of various products is required. As an example of what may be accomplished through the instrumentality of the Government along this line, there may be cited the practical interest that has been created in the fisheries for the sablefish of the Pacific coast, the tilefish of the Atlantic coast, and the grayfish of both coasts. These activities have greatly increased the production of food articles that otherwise would have been largely or entirely neglected; and the industries that have thus been developed, though as yet only in their infancy, are now being carried on by private enterprise that has been encouraged by the success of the Government's demonstrations.

A noteworthy departure in governmental activities is contemplated by that feature of the bill which provides that the Government itself shall engage in commercial fishing operations. It is apparently the intent of the bill, as it is understood to be the desire of the Senate Committee on Fisheries, that such operations shall not in any way interfere with the development of prosecution of private fishery enterprises. The hearing given this matter by the Committee on Fisheries in advance of the introduction of the bill indicated the wish of the members that every effort should be made to stimulate the commercial fisheries in respect to industries already established and to new branches that may be undertaken.

The department is glad to undertake this work and believes that it can carry it on successfully without interfering with private enterprise. Certainly it will make every effort to that end.

So far as Alaska is concerned, the chief opportunity for the Government to engage in the fishing business lies in the sea herring. This is one of the most abundant fishes in the north Pacific, and its numbers have not been utilized to anything like the extent that was possible. Up to this time the chief use made of the Alaska herring has been in the manufacture of oil and guano. The fish is equal to the herring of the Atlantic, and can undoubtedly be prepared for food in very large quantities. It is believed that the salmon fisheries of Alaska are now developed to the full extent justified by the supply; but there are a number of other fishes whose use can probably be stimulated by the Government, among them being the cod, the sablefish, and the atkafish. Congress should, however, understand that there now exist peculiar difficulties in the way of establishing the fishing business in Alaska, having to do with transportation, supplies, labor, and the shortness of the fishing season.

The enactment of this bill into law is recommended. If advantage is to be taken of the present fishing season and early practical results are to be obtained by the department, the passage of the bill should not be delayed.

Very truly, yours,
WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

Hon. HARRY LANE,
Chairman Committee on Fisheries, United States Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the amendment. I do not want to delay action on the pending measure at all. I am perfectly willing to submit it without any discussion. The Secretary's letter explains the object of the amendment and its provisions in a general way. I infer that the pending measure is intended to provide for the conservation of food and for the production and accumulation of food, and particularly to increase the food supply. The amendment is intended to take out of the ocean fishes that are in abundance there and put them in a shape by smoking and drying where they can be available to the public at a comparatively small expense.

Upon this point I wish to quote from testimony given by Mr. Perkins before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Mr. Perkins, on page 168, says:

Mr. PERKINS. Why, you know the way this country has been held up by speculation this last year in foodstuffs is something appalling. You take the matter of fish in New York. Some of you may know that one of the things we did was to go out on the Pacific coast when a certain kind of fish known as "Pacific coast smelts" were running out there. We bought large numbers of them and brought them to New York by express in refrigerator cars, and they were landed in New York four and one-half days after they had been swimming in the Pacific Ocean. We brought those to New York and retailed them at 6 cents a pound. We paid for catching them, we paid for loading them and boxing them, paid the expressage to New York, and delivered them to the fish dealers at 4½ cents a pound, and the fish dealers and meat dealers sold those fish at retail at 6 cents, so that they made a fair profit and we came out within $80 of even—we only lost $80 on the entire transaction of 10 or 11 carloads of fish. We were greenhorns in the business and knew nothing about it; simply butted in in an attempt to help the situation. When we began to sell those fish, smelts were selling in New York at 35 cents a pound, and when we finished after five or six weeks, they had broken to 18 cents or 19 cents a pound on fish caught right in the Atlantic Ocean within a few miles of where they were eaten, simply because the fish people had got the situation in hand on the Atlantic coast.

The people are not going to stand for the conditions, and we are going to have trouble just as sure as can be on the eastern side of New York on the food question if there is not something done pretty soon. In the rioting and the disturbances we had three or four months ago we were only able to quiet the people by such methods as we took in bringing those fish there and educating the people as to substitute foods.

That is all the argument I propose to offer at this time on the proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not act hastily on this proposition. It is a proposal to put the Government in the fish business, to send the Secretary of Commerce fishing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if his objection is based on the ground that he thinks this will infringe on the territory of Mr. Hoover?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know just where that territory is. It is impossible for me to give an accurate answer to the Senator from Missouri as to how far it extends, but this amendment should be thoroughly understood, I think, by the Senate. At 5 o'clock in the afternoon at the tail end of the consideration of the bill it is proposed to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to man a fishing fleet, to hire sailors and skippers, right and left, not only to purchase boats and go fishing and get all the fish he can by nets or spears or otherwise but also to pack them and to sell them, and go into the general business of dealing in fish. It occurs to me that it is not a wise proposal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I can not conceive that it was ever the purpose of anybody to put the Department of Commerce in the regular fishing business, going out and catching fish and packing them and marketing them and that kind of thing; but it is quite proper, it seems to me, in the prosecution of the work of the department in that line to allow the department to utilize the fish that it catches. That is, in the prosecution of the work of developing the supply or in developing new means of utilizing it, they ought to be permitted to sell what they catch, and that could be expressed by a very simple amendment, as follows: After the language that they can "take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals" in the prosecution of such operation; that is to say, in their operation for the purpose of developing new supplies and their efforts to secure further utilization of food supplies, they may take, pack, and so forth. I think the measure, on the whole, is a very meritorious one, and it ought to be amended as I have suggested.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Secretary of Commerce showing how to catch fish or how to treat them after they are caught, but it seems to me the language of this proposed amendment as I heard it read by the Secretary would really result in the establishment of a brand new function of government and a rather unusual function of government; and when once established, as every Senator knows, it is going to be exceedingly difficult to bring it to a halt; the number of men who will be employed will constantly increase, more and more boats will be chartered by the Government and operated by the Government, and greater territory will be covered, if it is possible for the Government to do it.

I have no objection to proper demonstrations. I wish this thing could have been brought up when we could have really given it consideration. For one, I can not very well consent to its adoption if I can prevent it this evening, although I do not want to delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, in my judgment there is very little of this bill that is not worthless. There is very much in the bill that may be extremely harmful. I do not think it is based on sound governmental or business principles. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] is to my mind about the only good thing in the bill. I would be glad to vote for any proposition which will punish a man for speculating in food products under such conditions as obtain to-day, but I do not want the Government to enter into this course for any other reasons.

The amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from Florida seems to me to be as virtuous as most of the propositions in the bill. I am particularly interested in it because I have been devoting a considerable part of time to-day to prevent the Navy Department from taking over two steam trawlers which have just been built and are ready to be put into operation by a cod-fishing firm. It would produce a very large volume of fish if they are allowed to go into that service. The Navy Department proposes to take them over for some purpose connected with naval affairs. If they do that it will very materially reduce the fish supply in the United States, because these two modern trawlers would probably secure ten times as many fish as the ordinary vessels used in that service.

Now, what kind of logic can it be which will suggest to one department of the Government to take away from the fishing service the vessels which are constructed for that purpose and empower another department of the Government to undertake the catching and curing of fish? It would disjoint it at best and be unwise it seems to me in every particular. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I do not think that this amendment ought to be laughed out of court. I invite the attention of the Senate long enough to explain why I think it is a matter worthy of serious rather than frivolous consideration.

We have heard a great deal about food conservation. We have heard a great many threats in this Chamber about hanging men for cornering the food supply and robbing the people, but it has only been talk. Nobody has been hanged yet. Nobody is seriously menaced for doing what it is claimed has been done.

It seems to me that this bill contains something more practical than hanging men. It contains a proposition which, if it is adopted by the Government, will help supply the food necessities of the United States.

This particular amendment, in the shape of a bill, was introduced by myself at the request of the late Senator from Oregon, Mr. Lane. A hearing was held before the Committee on Fisheries, and the proposition met with not only the commendation of the Senators present at that meeting but the Department of Commerce also gave it its sanction. The object of this amendment is to provide for the catching of fish in fields where private enterprise has not entered. The late Senator from Oregon made the statement before the committee that if the Government would equip an efficient fleet and go into the Alaskan waters, he believed—and he had given the matter serious study and investigation—that a catch of one barrel for every man, woman, and child in the United States could be obtained.

Nobody is now attempting to catch herring in the neighborhood of Alaska. No one is now trying to catch cod in Alaskan waters. The fish are there ready for the net if somebody will go and catch them and bring them in.

When we are confronted with a stringency which has seemed of sufficient proportions to alarm the whole country and the whole world and the seas are full of fishes, why should we not go and catch them for somebody to eat? That is the proposition. We provide for seed to be put in the ground so that somebody may raise a crop, but here is a harvest all ready to be gathered. All that is necessary is for some one to go there and put their nets into the sea and pick the fishes out of the sea and bring them here and feed them to the people. Only the other day in Milwaukee there was a catch made of the despised German carp and buffalo fish amounting to something like three or four thousand pounds, fish that ordinarily find no market in Wisconsin, because Wisconsin people are accustomed to eating the finest inland-water fish, I believe, in the country. Although the supply was limited the market where these fish were sold was fairly mobbed with people. The fish were being retailed at 6 or 8 cents a pound. Places were fairly stormed with people looking for cheap food.

Now, it may be a joke to some people to think that people are starving or are hard up for food and that the prices are so high they can not get the money to buy that food, but it is a mighty serious proposition for those people who are in that predicament. Some people might think it was funny that people should want to eat fish that are not ordinarily considered good food, but those people who are hard up and do not know how to make both ends meet do not look upon the matter as a joke; they look upon it as one of the serious problems of life. They would like to get some kind of food at a fair price, at a price which comes within their means, so that they may satisfy their hunger.

It will not do to say that the Government can not go into the fishing business and to make merry over the fact that the Secretary of Commerce may become a fisherman. We are going into a lot of things which have seemed to be a great deal funnier than that. Down at Hot Springs the Government is engaged in some sort of business that does not approach the dignity of catching fish to supply the demands of the people for food. In Yellowstone Park we are in the show business, as it were, because the exigencies make it necessary.

Now, what is there funny about the United States going and catching one hundred million barrels of herring or ten or twenty million barrels of cod and bringing them here and selling them to the people in order to relieve the food stringency in the country at this time, in a period of war? I am frank to say I do not believe the United States wants to remain in the fishing business. I am willing, as far as I am concerned, to have it confined to the time of this emergency. But here is a harvest all ready to be taken and drawn. It is waiting there for some one to go and take it. As a matter of common sense, if private individuals do not care to enter into that business, why should not we go into it and bring the fish here and relieve the food situation? In addition to that I understand that in salmon fisheries cod and other fishes—in fact, all fishes except salmon—are used as fertilizers for the land. They have wheels that are fastened in the streams and are set there for the purpose of catching salmon. In the course of the fishing they obtain codfish and other very excellent table fish, and these fishes die in those wheels. The late Senator from Oregon, Mr. Lane, who was the author of this bill, told me—and he was borne out by expert fishermen from the State of Oregon and, I think, from the State of Washington—that codfish and all these other fish that go into the wheels were tossed out on the lands and used as fertilizer. Why not take some steps to prevent that waste? Why would it not be a wise thing to provide that such fishes shall be preserved in some way and shall be sold to the people?

Of course it is easy to understand where the objection comes from to this bill. We do not have to guess very long why it is opposed. It is opposed by men who are in the fishing business. They do not want the Government to interfere in the fishing business; they do not want the Government to bring in fish food and to drive down their prices. But we are talking here of regulating prices. If we can do it by fiat, if we can fix prices by fiat, why is it not wise to reduce prices by increasing the food supply? When we encourage agriculture, when we urge the increase of acreage in order to increase the yield, are we not thereby indirectly encouraging the reduction of prices by the increased production which we are urging? In like manner when we are urging increased catches of fish, and this will result in the reduction of the price for which fish must be sold, why is it not a wise thing to do when people could then buy fish at a lower price than they otherwise could buy this food for?

But there is another thing. If these fields were all being taken care of—I mean to say that if the fishermen were, up in Alaska, catching all the fish that should be caught there, or were giving the matter any proper attention—that argument might be all well and good. They might say it would be improper for us to encourage any fishing in rivalry with private fishermen; but the fact is that these private fishermen do not seem to want to fish there.

We went into the shipping business to operate ships between this country and ports where private enterprise did not engage in the shipping business. We went into the shipping business for the same reasons that we ought to go into the fishing business. We would be going into this business because the men who are complaining do not go there and get the fish. I do not care how we get the fish; all I say is, let us obtain the fish, bring them here, and thereby increase the food supply in the United States.

I am not so much concerned about the sneers and the ridicule that have been thrown out whenever a matter of this kind is proposed. What I am concerned about is the fish. If the department can induce somebody to go up there and get 100,000,000 barrels of herring or other fish and bring them down here and put them on the market, that will be satisfactory to me; that will be satisfactory to the people who want fish. If, as I have already said, food that is already grown, waiting to be secured and brought here, is to remain unused for the simple reason that we are afraid that we shall be laughed at if we go into this business ourselves, then I prefer that we be laughed at and get the fish, because our people need them here.

The thing that appeals to me in this matter is this: It takes a good part of a year to grow and harvest the crops; it takes all the preparation that is necessary to get agricultural foodstuff. You take all the chances of the weather; you take all the chances that go with agriculture, with the rainfall or want of rainfall; but here we have a crop that is an absolutely certain thing. The fish are there; they are grown; they are ready for the nets. All you have got to do is to go out and get them.

I think the late Senator from Oregon had a very wise idea when he suggested this, and it is his idea. It was the last thing that he wanted done before he left here to return no more. He was familiar with this matter; he had given it a great deal of thought and study, and he saw here an opportunity to do a distinct service for his country before he left the country's service. I agree with him. I think this amendment has at least the basis of a good proposition.

If this amendment is passed, I do not believe that the Commerce Department is going to go into this fishery business where anybody else is fishing. They will do what they were expected to do when this amendment was introduced if it should be adopted. They will go and get fish where nobody else is trying to get them, and they will bring them here, not for profit to the Government, but for the purpose of helping to increase the food supply of the United States. That the demand is here, that the people would like to obtain this cheap fish food, goes without saying.

I pointed out a little while ago that the people are desperate in some places because their purses do not keep pace with their appetites and with their necessities. Instead of making efforts here against these people, let us do something practical that will produce food for the people. Here, according to the statement of the late Senator from Oregon, we will get results, and results which will be absolutely certain.

I have heard a great deal said here in the course of the last week—and some day I am going to take occasion to occupy more of the time of the Senate than I have this afternoon in discussing it—about food dictators and all that sort of thing. We are in extraordinary times. The statement that we are at war has got to be a trite saying; but, trite as it may be, it is a stern and stubborn fact, as we are bound to discover in the course of time.

We also know that there is a shortage of food in this country. We know that men who are working for moderate wages have a hard time making both ends meet. Something has got to be done—not talk, but something practical, something real—to bring down the cost of living. We can not expect men to go to war and fight and at the same time leave their families behind them to starve. They want to know that their people are being looked after and taken care of. One thing that has got to be done at all hazards is to prevent discontent at home; and nothing will so promote discontent as hunger, privation, and starvation. It is a matter that has got to be met in a practical way; and while this may not be just exactly as high-toned a way as might be found to increase the food supply, yet if any other Senator has anything more practical to propose in the way of securing this immense food supply that is obtainable only for the asking and the taking, very well and good. I am not particular about the way. What I want is some practical proposition that will bring down the cost of living and will give people enough to eat, and at such prices so that they can live without going into debt or without ruination to themselves. It is a matter that we have got to meet; and here is one very modest way, but yet a very practical way of getting some results.

I am for the amendment and the proposition of the late Senator from Oregon. I say give the Government the right and power to make this sort of afrangement, whether the department in the end decides to go into this business or not, so long as they get fish and bring them here and give the people something to eat. That is why I shall support the amendment gladly and cheerfully and without any sense of the ridiculous or without having any idea that this is a funny thing. I shall vote for it, because I think it is a very proper and a very meritorious proposition, and I hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Is the Senator familiar with the work of the Perkins commission in New York, which sent across the continent, brought smelts from the Pacific coast, and cut the price in New York to the people there from 35 cents a pound to about 6 or 7 cents a pound? That was not a ridiculous proposition to the people who were seeking a cheaper food supply.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator that I have read about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if those fish were caught by the Perkins commission?

Mr. KENYON. I think not. I think they secured them there by purchase.

Mr. PITTMAN. I merely call attention to that, because the view I take of it, and shall urge, is that instead of catching the fish the Government will do a whole lot better by encouraging the catching of fish and the bringing them here by private enterprise.

Mr. KENYON. I think they tasted just as good to the hungry people of New York as if they had been caught by the commission.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Iowa. I do not think the people who ate the fish knew whether the fish were profaned by the hands of some Government employee or not, and really that is beside the point. So far as I am concerned, I do not care what arrangements the Department of Commerce may make as to getting this fish supply. If it can get this supply in some way that would produce the same result as in the case of the smelt, it will be satisfactory to that extent. The price in that case was reduced for the very plain and simple reason that the catch of smelt was increased and the smelt were brought upon the market. Of course when they came upon the market the price of smelt fell, for the simple reason that there were more smelt to go around. Consequently if only a small fraction of the amount of herring that could be caught in Alaskan waters were brought into the United States, I have not the slightest doubt, whether they are caught by individuals who are induced to go up there by the Department of Commerce or by fishermen engaged directly to catch for the Government, that not only the price of herring will fall but the price of meat and of all other foodstuffs will fall, because they are all so interrelated and so intimately connected one with the other that the level of the price of foodstuffs rises and falls in sympathy and horizontally. If we can increase the food supply of this country either by such a method as that pursued in New York or by the other method, by the method of this amendment, we will get results, and that is what I am after.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, is an amendment to the pending amendment in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I offer an amendment to the amendment. I have indicated on a copy of the amendment the portions I move to strike out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on line 8, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to strike out:

> And to take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals; and to do any and all things necessary and convenient for carrying out the purposes of this act.

On page 2, after the word "vessels," in line 3, to strike out "and fishing gear," and in line 10, after the word "necessary," to strike out:

> And to buy and sell fishes and other aquatic food animals, either fresh or cured: Provided, That the proceeds of any sales shall be accounted for and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the amendment simply accomplishes the purpose of striking out that portion of the amendment which permits the Government to engage in the fishing business under the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Senator be willing to have the amendment read as it would read if his amendment to the amendment were agreed to?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like very much to hear it read in that form.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as it would read if the amendment I have offered were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct such operations in the United States, including Alaska, as may be necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods employed in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods; and to increase the consumption thereof.

That for the said purposes the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hire, charter, rent, or purchase buildings and lands, vessels, and any and all equipment necessary or convenient for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; to employ all persons necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; to purchase, either in the open market or in competitive bids, such supplies as may be necessary.

That for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this act, including the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office, there shall be appropriated a sum not to exceed $250,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, when Senate bill 2263 was pending I offered an amendment to it. I desire now to offer the same amendment to the pending bill, in order that I may call it up at an appropriate time. I will ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. It was my purpose to propose an amendment, which I shall offer if the amendment tendered by the Senator from Nevada is rejected, and I suggest that it will perhaps reach the same purpose that the Senator has in mind.

I believe that the Secretary ought to be authorized to take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market fish and other aquatic food animals in the conduct of the operations which he is authorized to carry on in the first part of the bill, for the purpose of developing new sources of supply and for the purpose of utilizing them. That is to say, whatever fish he catches in carrying on his work of development, and whatever he packs in order to show how they can be better utilized, and so on, those things he might properly be permitted, it seems to me, to sell; and I had intended to propose the insertion of these words after the word "animals," in line 10:

In the prosecution of such operations.

So that the Secretary would be authorized to conduct operations in the United States necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, and so forth, and to take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals in the prosecution of such operations.

Mr. PITTMAN. That would be perfectly satisfactory, provided the Secretary of Commerce would place that construction on it. It must be apparent, however, that under the guise of developing new foods he might simply engage in the business of fishing.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 1, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 31, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Heavenly Father, look with compassion, we beseech Thee, upon the infirmities of Thy children everywhere, and move upon their hearts with the spirit of grace; that they may be able to cast out the demons of jealousy and spite, contention and strife, hate and revenge; that the good angels of their being may reach the ascendency and bring peace and good will to all peoples; that all the world of mankind may live as children of the Living God; in the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 29, 1917, was read and approved.

THE ITALIAN MISSION.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be authorized to extend an invitation to the Italian mission now visiting the United States to visit this House on Saturday next, at an hour convenient to themselves, and that the House stand in recess for 30 minutes at that time that they may be received on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] asks unanimous consent that the Speaker be authorized to invite the Italian mission to visit the House on Saturday next, at such time as shall be satisfactory to them, and that the House stand in recess for 30 minutes at that time to receive them on the floor of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule, and I desire to give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS OF MR. SHERWOOD.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein the patriotic, poetic, and eloquent oration of our distinguished colleague, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, delivered at the Memorial Day exercises held at Arlington Cemetery May 30, 1917.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein a telegram which I sent to Mr. Ross L. Hammond, the editor of the Fremont Tribune, at Fremont, Nebr., respecting subscriptions to the liberty loan in that locality.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram is as follows:

Mr. ROSS L. HAMMOND,
Editor Fremont Tribune, Fremont, Nebr.:

My attention has been called to a press dispatch from Fremont, Nebr., to the effect that a few bankers in that locality were not subscribing to the liberty loan because of the threat of some stockholders to boycott them if they do. I am unwilling to believe that this report is true. It ought to be investigated, and, if false, a public denial made in the interest of the patriotic people of Nebraska. If true, the parties attempting through this method to destroy the power of the Government to raise war funds ought to be exposed to public condemnation, if not prosecution for treason. War has been made upon us by a powerful foe, and those who weaken by treachery at home the arms of our brave men who will soon be in mortal combat for the preservation of free peoples are beneath the contempt of honest men and should be made to feel the strong hand of the law. Those who enjoy the blessings of this land of freedom and opportunity and are not now ready to aid and defend it in this hour of need are not fit to longer live in it and enjoy its blessings. The enemy in front of us threatens to destroy all free and independent governments left in the world, and we can not afford to tolerate enemies in our rear while this mighty struggle for human rights is on.

DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

EXPLOSIVES.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] striking out section 3 of the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes, upon which the previous question has been ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 123, noes 113.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 156, noes 165, answering "present" 6, not voting 102, as follows:

"'SEC. 15. It shall be lawful for the President to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as he may deem necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart from the United States or any of its possessions in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it ought not to remain, and to detain or prevent any foreign vessel from so departing in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it is not entitled to depart.'

"SEC. 11. The joint resolution approved March 4, 1915, 'To empower the President to better enforce and maintain the neutrality of the United States,' and any act or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this title are hereby repealed.

"TITLE VI.

"SEIZURE OF ARMS AND OTHER ARTICLES INTENDED FOR EXPORT.

"SECTION 1. Whenever an attempt is made to export or ship from or take out of the United States, any arms or munitions of war, or other articles, in violation of law, or whenever there shall be known or probable cause to believe that any such arms or munitions of war, or other articles, are being or are intended to be exported, or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, and marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other person duly authorized for the purpose by the President, may seize and detain any articles or munitions of war about to be exported or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, and the vessels or vehicles containing the same, and retain possession thereof until released or disposed of as hereinafter directed. If upon due inquiry as hereinafter provided, the property seized shall appear to have been about to be so unlawfully exported, shipped from, or taken out of the United States, the same shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the person making any seizure under this title to apply, with due diligence, to the judge of the district court of the United States, or to the judge of the United States district court of the Canal Zone, or to the judge of a court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place within which the seizure is made, for a warrant to justify the further detention of the property so seized, which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation showing that there is known or probable cause to believe that the property seized is being or is intended to be exported or shipped from or taken out of the United States in violation of law; and if the judge refuses to issue the warrant, or application therefor is not made by the person making the seizure within a reasonable time, not exceeding 10 days after the seizure, the property shall forthwith be restored to the owner or person from whom seized. If the judge is satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this title and issues his warrant accordingly, then the property shall be detained by the person seizing it until the President, who is hereby expressly authorized so to do, orders it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it is discharged in due course of law on petition of the claimant, or on trial of condemnation proceedings, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 3. The owner or claimant of any property seized under this title may, at any time before condemnation proceedings have been instituted, as hereinafter provided, file his petition for its restoration in the district court of the United States, or the district court of the Canal Zone, or the court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place in which the seizure was made, whereupon the court shall advance the cause for hearing and determination with all possible dispatch, and, after causing notice to be given to the United States attorney for the district and to the person making the seizure, shall proceed to hear and decide whether the property seized shall be restored to the petitioner or forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 4. Whenever the person making any seizure under this title applies for and obtains a warrant for the detention of the property, and (a) upon the hearing and determination of the petition of the owner or claimant restoration is denied, or (b) the owner or claimant fails to file a petition for restoration within 30 days after the seizure, the United States attorney for the district wherein it was seized, upon direction of the Attorney General, shall institute libel proceedings in the United States district court or the district court of the Canal Zone or the court of first instance of the Philippine Islands having jurisdiction over the place wherein the seizure was made, against the property for condemnation; and if, after trial and hearing of the issues involved, the property is condemned, it shall be disposed of by sale, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, paid into the Treasury.

"SEC. 5. The proceedings in such summary trials upon the petition of the owner or claimant of the property seized, as well as in the libel cases herein provided for, shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in such libel cases, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States: Provided, That upon the payment of the costs and legal expenses of both the summary trials and the libel proceedings herein provided for, and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond in an amount double the value of the property seized, conditioned that it will not be exported or used or employed contrary to the provisions of this title, the court, in its discretion, may direct that it be delivered to the owners thereof or to the claimants thereof.

"SEC. 6. Except in those cases in which the exportation of arms and munitions of war or other article is forbidden by proclamation or otherwise by the President, as provided in section 1 of this title, nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with any trade in such commodities, conducted with any foreign port or place wheresoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this title, under the law of nations, or under the treaties or conventions entered into by the United States, or under the laws thereof.

"SEC. 7. Upon payment of the costs and legal expenses incurred in any such summary trial for possession or libel proceedings, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order the release and restoration to the owner or claimant, as the case may be, of any property seized or condemned under the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 8. The President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"TITLE VII.

"CERTAIN EXPORTS IN TIME OF WAR UNLAWFUL.

"SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

"SEC. 2. Any person who shall export, ship, or take out, or deliver or attempt to deliver for export, shipment, or taking out, any article in violation of this title, or of any regulation or order made hereunder, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and any article so delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, or so attempted to be delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States; and any officer, director, or agent of a corporation who participates in any such violation shall be liable to like fine or imprisonment, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, is about to carry out of the United States any article or articles in violation of the provisions of this title, the collector of customs for the district in which such vessel is located is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to review by the Secretary of Commerce, to refuse clearance to any such vessel, domestic or foreign, for which clearance is required by law, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, to forbid the departure of such vessel from the port, and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this section shall take, or attempt to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her forbidden cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

"TITLE VIII.

Whoever, in relation to any dispute or controversy between a foreign government and the United States, shall willfully and knowingly make any untrue statement, either orally or in writing, under oath before any person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which the affiant has knowledge or reason to believe will, or may be used to influence the measures or conduct of any foreign government, or of any officer or agent of any foreign government, to the injury of the United States, or with a view or intent to influence any measure of or action by the Government of the United States, or any branch thereof, to the injury of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 2. Whoever within the jurisdiction of the United States shall falsely assume or pretend to be a diplomatic or consular or other official of a foreign government duly accredited as such to the Government of the United States with intent to defraud such foreign government or any person, and shall take upon himself to act as such, or in such pretended character shall demand or obtain, or attempt to obtain from any person or from said foreign government, or from any officer thereof, any money, paper, document, or other thing of value, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whoever, other than a diplomatic or consular officer or attaché, shall act in the United States as an agent of a foreign government without prior notification to the Secretary of State shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 4. The words 'foreign government,' as used in this act and in sections 156, 157, 161, 170, 171, 172, 173, and 220 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' shall be deemed to include any government, faction, or body of insurgents within a country with which the United States is at peace, which government, faction, or body of insurgents may or may not have been recognized by the United States as a government.

"SEC. 5. If two or more persons within the jurisdiction of the United States conspire to injure or destroy specific property situated within a foreign country and belonging to a foreign government or to any political subdivision thereof with which the United States is at peace, or any railroad, canal, bridge, or other public utility so situated, and if one or more of such persons commits an act within the jurisdiction of the United States to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to the conspiracy shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both. Any indictment or information under this section shall describe the specific property which it was the object of the conspiracy to injure or destroy.

"TITLE IX.

"PASSPORTS.

"SECTION 1. Before a passport is issued to any person by or under authority of the United States such person shall subscribe to and submit a written application duly verified by his oath before a person authorized and empowered to administer oaths, which said application shall contain a true recital of each and every matter of fact which may be required by law or by any rules authorized by law to be stated as a prerequisite to the issuance of any such passport. Clerks of United States courts, agents of the Department of State, or other Federal officials authorized, or who may be authorized, to take passport applications and administer oaths thereon, shall collect, for all services in connection therewith, a fee of $1, and no more, in lieu of all fees prescribed by any statute of the United States, whether the application is executed singly, in duplicate, or in triplicate.

"SEC. 2. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly make any false statement in an application for passport with intent to induce or secure the issuance of a passport under the authority of the United States, either for his own use or the use of another, contrary to the laws regulating the issuance of passports or the rules prescribed pursuant to such laws, or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use or attempt to use, or furnish to another for use, any passport the issue of which was secured in any way by reason of any false statement, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use, any passport issued or designed for the use of another than himself, or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use or attempt to use any passport in violation of the conditions or restrictions therein contained, or of the rules prescribed pursuant to the laws regulating the issuance of passports, which said rules shall be printed on the passport; or whoever shall willfully and knowingly furnish, dispose of, or deliver a passport to any person, for use by another than the person for whose use it was originally issued and designed, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 4. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, counterfeit, mutilate, or alter, or cause or procure to be falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered any passport or instrument purporting to be a passport, with intent to use the same, or with intent that the same may be used by another; or whoever shall willfully and knowingly use, or attempt to use, or furnish to another for use any such false, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered passport or instrument purporting to be a passport, or any passport validly issued which has become void by the occurrence of any condition therein prescribed invalidating the same, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"TITLE X.

"COUNTERFEITING GOVERNMENT SEAL.

"SECTION 1. Whoever shall fraudulently or wrongfully affix or impress the seal of any executive department, or of any bureau, commission, or office of the United States, to or upon any certificate, instrument, commission, document, or paper of any description; or whoever, with knowledge of its fraudulent character, shall with wrongful or fraudulent intent use, buy, procure, sell, or transfer to another any such certificate, instrument, commission, document, or paper, to which or upon which said seal has been so fraudulently affixed or impressed, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 2. Whoever shall falsely make, forge, counterfeit, mutilate, or alter, or cause or procure to be made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered, or shall willingly assist in falsely making, forging, counterfeiting, mutilating, or altering, the seal of any executive department, or any bureau, commission, or office of the United States, or whoever shall knowingly use, affix, or impress any such fraudulently made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered seal to or upon any certificate, instrument, commission, document, or paper, of any description, or whoever with wrongful or fraudulent intent shall have possession of any such falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered seal, knowing the same to have been so falsely made, forged, counterfeited, mutilated, or altered, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

"TITLE XI.

"SEARCH WARRANTS.

"SECTION 1. A search warrant authorized by this title may be issued by a judge of a United States district court, or by a judge of a State or Territorial court of record, or by a United States commissioner for the district wherein the property sought is located.

"SEC. 2. A search warrant may be issued under this title upon either of the following grounds:

"1. When the property was stolen or embezzled in violation of a law of the United States; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from any house or other place in which it is concealed, or from the possession of the person by whom it was stolen or embezzled, or from any person in whose possession it may be.

"2. When the property was used as the means of committing a felony; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from any house or other place in which it is concealed, or from the possession of the person by whom it was used in the commission of the offense, or from any person in whose possession it may be.

"3. When the property, or any paper, is possessed, controlled, or used in violation of section 22 of this title; in which case it may be taken on the warrant from the person violating said section, or from any person in whose possession it may be, or from any house or other place in which it is concealed.

"SEC. 3. A search warrant can not be issued but upon probable cause, supported by affidavit, naming or describing the person and particularly describing the property and the place to be searched.

"SEC. 4. The judge or commissioner must, before issuing the warrant, examine on oath the complainant and any witness he may produce, and require their affidavits or take their depositions in writing and cause them to be subscribed by the parties making them.

"SEC. 5. The affidavits or depositions must set forth the facts tending to establish the grounds of the application or probable cause for believing that they exist.

"SEC. 6. If the judge or commissioner is thereupon satisfied of the existence of the grounds of the application or that there is probable cause to believe their existence, he must issue a search warrant, signed by him with his name of office, to a civil officer of the United States duly authorized to enforce or assist in enforcing any law thereof, or to a person so duly authorized by the President of the United States, stating the particular grounds or probable cause for its issue and the names of the persons whose affidavits have been taken in support thereof, and commanding him forthwith to search the person or place named, for the property specified, and to bring it before the judge or commissioner.

"SEC. 7. A search warrant may in all cases be served by any of the officers mentioned in its direction, but by no other person, except in aid of the officer on his requiring it, he being present and acting in its execution.

"SEC. 8. The officer may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, or any part of a house, or anything therein, to execute the warrant, if, after notice of his authority and purpose, he is refused admittance.

"SEC. 9. He may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house for the purpose of liberating a person who, having entered to aid him in the execution of the warrant, is detained therein, or when necessary for his own liberation.

"SEC. 10. The judge or commissioner must insert a direction in the warrant that it be served in the daytime, unless the affidavits are positive that the property is on the person or in the place to be searched, in which case he may insert a direction that it be served at any time of the day or night.

"SEC. 11. A search warrant must be executed and returned to the judge or commissioner who issued it within 10 days after its date; after the expiration of this time the warrant, unless executed, is void.

"SEC. 12. When the officer takes property under the warrant he must give a copy of the warrant together with a receipt for the property taken (specifying it in detail) to the person from whom it was taken by him, or in whose possession it was found; or, in the absence of any person, he must leave it in the place where he found the property.

"SEC. 13. The officer must forthwith return the warrant to the judge or commissioner and deliver to him a written inventory of the property taken, made publicly or in the presence of the person from whose possession it was taken, and of the applicant for the warrant, if they are present, verified by the affidavit of the officer at the foot of the inventory and taken before the judge or commissioner at the time, to the following effect: 'I, R. S., the officer by whom this warrant was executed, do swear that the above inventory contains a true and detailed account of all the property taken by me on the warrant.'

"SEC. 14. The judge or commissioner must thereupon, if required, deliver a copy of the inventory to the person from whose possession the property was taken and to the applicant for the warrant.

"SEC. 15. If the grounds on which the warrant was issued be controverted, the judge or commissioner must proceed to take testimony in relation thereto, and the testimony of each witness must be reduced to writing and subscribed by each witness.

"SEC. 16. If it appears that the property or paper taken is not the same as that described in the warrant or that there is no probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, the judge or commissioner must cause it to be restored to the person from whom it was taken; but if it appears that the property or paper taken is the same as that described in the warrant and that there is probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, then the judge or commissioner shall order the same retained in the custody of the person seizing it or to be otherwise disposed of according to law.

"SEC. 17. The judge or commissioner must annex the affidavits, search warrant, return, inventory, and evidence, and if he has not power to inquire into the offense in respect to which the warrant was issued he must at once file the same, together with a copy of the record of his proceedings, with the clerk of the court having power to so inquire.

"SEC. 18. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any such officer or person in serving or attempting to serve or execute any such search warrant, or shall assault, beat, or wound any such officer or person, knowing him to be an officer or person so authorized, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years.

"SEC. 19. Sections 125 and 126 of the Criminal Code of the United States shall apply to and embrace all persons making oath or affirmation or procuring the same under the provisions of this title, and such persons shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of said sections.

"SEC. 20. A person who maliciously and without probable cause procures a search warrant to be issued and executed shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 21. An officer who in executing a search warrant willfully exceeds his authority, or exercises it with unnecessary severity, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 22. Whoever, in aid of any foreign Government, shall knowingly and willfully have possession of or control over any property or papers designed or intended for use or which is used as the means of violating any penal statute, or any of the rights or obligations of the United States under any treaty or the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 23. Nothing contained in this title shall be held to repeal or impair any existing provisions of law regulating search and the issue of search warrants.

"TITLE XII.

"USE OF MAILS.

"SECTION 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

"SEC. 2. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

"SEC. 3. Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by this title to be nonmailable, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Any person violating any provision of this title may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed, or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed.

"TITLE XIII.

"GENERAL PROVISIONS.

"SECTION 1. The term 'United States' as used in this act includes the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental or insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 2. The several courts of first instance in the Philippine Islands and the district court of the Canal Zone shall have jurisdiction of offenses under this act committed within their respective districts, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the United States of offenses under this act committed upon the high seas, and of conspiracies to commit such offenses, as defined by section 37 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, and the provisions of said section, for the purpose of this act, are hereby extended to the Philippine Islands, and to the Canal Zone. In such cases the district attorneys of the Philippine Islands and of the Canal Zone shall have the powers and perform the duties provided in this act for United States attorneys.

"SEC. 3. Offenses committed and penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to the taking effect hereof under any law embraced in or changed, modified, or repealed by any chapter of this act may be prosecuted and punished, and suits and proceedings for causes arising or acts done or committed prior to the taking effect hereof may be commenced and prosecuted, in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. 4. If any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

On May 4, 1917, when the House passed this bill and sent it to the Senate, the Senate was already considering a similar bill (S. 2) which had been introduced in the Senate. The Senate continued the consideration of its bill, and after perfecting and agreeing to it took up the House bill, and, without considering it in its detailed provisions, adopted the Senate bill, as it had been perfected, as an amendment for the House bill by striking out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and substituting the Senate bill as it had been agreed upon in the Senate. It therefore became the duty of the conferees to weld these two bills into one by adopting the provisions from one or the other with such amendments as seemed necessary to the conferees, within the limits of the conference, to perfect the bill and bring its various provisions into harmony.

In the main the two bills contained similar provisions, but expressed in different language. The conferees took up the Senate amendment and made it the basis of their final agreement. Some of the sections were agreed to as written, others were amended so as to embody provisions contained in the House bill, or sections from the House bill were substituted for them, and in a few instances sections were rewritten in conference in order to harmonize the views of the two Houses.

It would be very difficult to point out in minute detail the differences between the bill as it passed the House and that agreed upon in conference, and this would serve no very useful purpose, since they can be as easily ascertained by a comparison. The material changes made in the House bill are, however, pointed out below.

ARRANGEMENT.

Chapter 2 of the Senate amendment was brought forward and made chapter 1, thereby making the order of chapters conform to the order of titles in the House bill. The conferees adopted the House plan of designating the main subdivisions of the bill as "title" instead of "chapter." The several sections under each title were consecutively numbered, beginning in each title with section 1.

TITLE I.

ESPIONAGE.

The several provisions under this title in the conferees' report do not materially change the provisions of this title as passed by the House. Section 1 sets out the places connected with the national defense to which the prohibitions of the section apply while the similar provision of the House bill designates such places in general terms.

Section 2 of the House bill made the person guilty for doing the things enumerated therein "with intent or knowledge, or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States." Under section 2 (a) as agreed upon, this provision is made to read, "with intent or reason to believe that it is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of a foreign nation."

Section 3 is not materially changed from the provision contained in the bill as it passed the House, except by the addition thereto of the following provision: "or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States to the injury of the service or of the United States."

Section 4 as agreed to materially modifies this section as it passed the House. It describes specifically the character of information useful to the enemy which shall not be published and makes it unlawful to publish it. It leaves out the part that requires the President by proclamation to determine the character of information prohibited and the existence of the national emergency, but authorizes the President, by proclamation, to declare the character of such prohibited information which is not useful to the enemy and thereupon it makes it lawful to publish such information.

Section 7 was not in the House bill but was taken from the Senate amendment. It was adopted because of the changes made in section 1, and for the further reason that section 1202 of the House bill, which gave the words "national defense" a broad meaning, was stricken out.

TITLE II.

VESSELS IN PORTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

No material change was made in any of the sections under this title from those contained in the House bill.

TITLE III.

INJURING VESSELS ENGAGED IN FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The House provisions under this title were not materially changed.

TITLE IV.

INTERFERENCE WITH FOREIGN COMMERCE BY VIOLENT MEANS.

The provisions of the House bill under this title were changed in conference by striking out the clause which protected the places where the articles referred to were "produced or stored" and substituting similar protection to "the places where they may be while in such foreign commerce."

TITLE V.

ENFORCEMENT OF NEUTRALITY.

No material change was made in the provisions under this title. The power given to the Secretary of the Treasury under section 505 of the House bill was transferred in conference to the Secretary of Commerce. This amendment was adopted to make the bill conform to the policy adopted heretofore.

TITLE VI.

SEIZURE OF ARMS AND OTHER ARTICLES INTENDED FOR EXPORT.

Section 1 not only authorizes the seizure of arms and munitions of war about to be exported, shipped from, or taken out of the United States in violation of law, as provided by section 1 of the House bill, but adds "or other articles" so exported, etc.

Section 6 did not appear in the bill as it passed the House, but was taken from the Senate amendment. It makes no material change in the bill and adds no new matter. It is but a legislative declaration that the provisions of this title are not to be interpreted to extend by implication to articles in commerce other than those forbidden by the President's proclamation as expressly provided for.

Other sections under this title have not been materially changed.

TITLE VII.

CERTAIN EXPORTS IN TIME OF WAR UNLAWFUL.

None of the provisions of this title were contained in the bill as it passed the House. It was taken, after some modifications and amendments, from the Senate amendment.

The provisions of this title are limited to the period of the present war, and vest in the President the power to regulate exportations, etc., whenever he shall find that the public safety shall so require. These provisions were agreed to in conference because of the present necessity that this power should be vested in some responsible head in order that we may better conserve our resources and more efficiently use both our exports and our exporting facilities to aid in the prosecution of the war as well as to safeguard them from being used in such a way as to finally benefit the enemy.

TITLE VIII.

DISTRIBUTION OF FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Section 5 was so amended as to include, in addition to property situated within a foreign country and belonging to a foreign government or a political subdivision thereof with which the United States is at peace, also "any railroad, canal, bridge, or other public utility so situated," and the provision that "such injury or destruction would constitute a crime punished by imprisonment under the laws of the United States," was stricken out. The remaining provisions under this title were not materially changed in conference.

TITLE IX.

PASSPORTS.

No material change was made in conference of the provisions of this title.

TITLE X.

COUNTERFEITING GOVERNMENT SEAL.

No material change was made in conference of the provisions of this title.

TITLE XI.

SEARCH WARRANTS.

This title was entirely rewritten in conference. The new title as presented by the conferees was based upon the New York law on this subject, and follows generally the policy of that law. It has written into it many of the provisions of the title as passed by the House.

TITLE XII.

USE OF MAILS.

Section 1100 of the bill as it passed the House was rewritten into sections 1 and 2 of the bill reported by the conferees. The material additions made in section 1 to the provisions contained in section 1100 are:

(1) The things enumerated, in violation of any of the provisions of the act, are also made nonmailable if "intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful."

(2) The following proviso was added: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself."

Section 2 of the title as reported by the conferees substitutes for "of a treasonable character, or of a character advocating the destruction of or injury to the Government by violence," the following: "containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States."

The other provisions under this title have not been materially changed.

TITLE XIII.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Sections 1200 and 1201 of the bill as it passed the House have not been changed. Section 1202 has been stricken out for the reason that the amendments in the several sections of the bill made this section unnecessary. Sections 3 and 4 as reported by the conferees are new sections added by the conferees.

Section 3 appeared at several different places in the Senate amendment. It was stricken out at these several places in the bill and added under this title and made applicable to the entire bill.

Section 4 was added, following the precedents in other legislation, as a declaration of the intent of Congress, to guide the courts in event the constitutionality of any of the numerous provisions contained in the bill are hereafter brought in question.

Managers on the part of the House.

During the reading of the report the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with. No one is paying any attention, including the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is mistaken in that. The "gentleman from California" is here and listening.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is proceeding with the reading of the report.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the report.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I would like to get some agreement as to the time we shall occupy in debate on this conference report from my friends on the other side, if I may.

Mr. MANN. How much time would the gentleman propose?

Mr. WEBB. I would like very much, if I could, to close it all in one hour.

Mr. MANN. We have requests over on this side for about two hours and a half, but I think we ought to get along with less time.

Mr. WEBB. I hope so.

Mr. MANN. I would be willing, so far as I am concerned, to make it 45 minutes on a side.

Mr. WEBB. That is entirely agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to control the time on that side and I to control it on this side.

Mr. WEBB. And at the end of that time it is understood the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. MANN. There is a motion to recommit, which may be offered first, and the previous question may be considered as ordered on both the adoption of the report and the motion to recommit.

Mr. WEBB. That is entirely agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that debate on this report be limited to an hour and a half, one half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and that at the end of that time it will be permissible to offer a motion to recommit, and that the previous question shall be considered as ordered both on the motion to recommit and the conference report. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who under this agreement will control the time on this side if those who are in favor of this bill will receive any time?

Mr. MANN. I had not supposed any Republican would be in favor of it after the action of the Republican caucus. If there are any Republicans in favor of it, however, I will do the best I can to give them time.

Mr. DYER. As to that, Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I do not take my instructions as to my duty to my country or as to matters of this kind in time of war from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the Republican caucus.

Mr. FOCHT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether this 45 minutes on this side will be, as usually the case, consumed by the members of the committee?

Mr. MANN. I can not say.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to know. I have something to say on this question, and I would like to know whether I will have an opportunity.

Mr. MANN. I doubt very much whether the gentleman can get it in that time.

Mr. FOCHT. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. WEBB. I give notice that when the debate has run for an hour and a half, I will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. You have an hour on that side, and the gentleman can move the previous question in his hour.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I think we are very close to an agreement here. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] wants a little time, it may be that we can limit this discussion to an hour on a side. I do not think the House cares for a discussion, but if the gentleman wants to be heard I want to be agreeable, and if we can agree to an hour on a side, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and one hour by me——

Mr. MANN. I have requests for two hours and a half of time, not allowing time to the gentlemen who have now asked for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman lays before the House the following motion to recommit, and we will get rid of that part of it.

Motion to recommit, by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: I move to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference with instructions to the managers on the part of the House to agree to eliminate from the bill in conference both the letter and substance of section 4 of Title I in the bill as it passed the House or as contained in the pending conference report.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from North Carolina made an agreement about the time?

Mr. WEBB. I have not, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for an hour.

Mr. WEBB. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to be notified when I have used 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the managers of the conference on the part of the House have tried to perform their duty with respect to this difficult bill conscientiously and effectively, and, generally speaking, I may say that the bill presented to you today is practically the bill as it passed the House. The only changes that have been made worth mentioning are in the espionage section proper, and there we agreed as to the particular designation of what matters should not be entered upon or flown over, instead of the "national defense" as a general description.

We used the same language and require the same testimony to prove guilt, however, in all the espionage sections except section 4. That is known as the censorship section, and of course we had considerable difficulty in arriving at an agreement on this section 4 of Title I.

We knew how many Members of the House felt on the censorship question, and I will say to you, gentlemen, that we have presented to you here what is called a censorship section; but, as a matter of fact, there is no censorship about it. We have presented a section which is milder than anything that has been presented to the House so far—five times as mild as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] when the bill was under discussion originally, and milder even than the "compromise" amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] presented to me for presentation to the conference committee.

In fact, gentlemen, unless this House wants to put itself on record as favoring the right of the newspapers to furnish and publish information as to the movement, numbers, and disposition of the armed forces of this country in time of war in a naval or military operation, which information is useful to the enemy, I think the House ought to support the amendment. In other words, it seems to me that if you want the newspapers of the country to publish that kind of information, then you will vote to recommit this bill with instructions to strike out section 4.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Is there anything in the bill that would prohibit anybody from criticizing the quality of the food or clothing that might be furnished to the soldiers?

Mr. WEBB. Nothing whatever. It was proposed that we should include the words "or equipment." We struck it out. We use this language in the section:

When the United States is at war the publishing willfully of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which information is useful to the enemy, is hereby prohibited.

Now, I appeal to the conscience and patriotism of every Member on that side of the House and on this side, too: Do you believe that that kind of information ought to be furnished by a newspaper simply because it stands back and says, "I want to enjoy the freedom of the press"?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WEBB. In a moment. I will say to the House that we agreed to stop right there. That does not give anybody the power to censor anything. That is a congressional expression as to what kind of information ought not to be published, and it would keep the newspapers from letting the spies and the enemy know the movements of the armed forces and give protection to our country. I say we would have stopped there, but it was argued that if we made that rigid rule there might be times occasionally when certain information with regard to the movement and disposition of our troops would not be useful to the enemy, and therefore we added this clause—

And the President may from time to time by proclamation declare the character of such above-described information which in his opinion is not useful to the enemy, and thereupon it should be lawful to publish the same.

That refers to these movements and designations of troops that may not be useful to the enemy, and thereupon it may be lawful to publish such information. In other words, we make the law, and if in the opinion of the President certain information would not be useful to the enemy the newspapers can publish it.

Now, what could be fairer, gentlemen of the House, than that provision? We have written in the bill a provision that in case of trial the jury shall not only say whether the information was willfully published, but also that the published information was useful to the enemy. Tell me where a paper's liberty is threatened by that.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. If a condition should arise where we would have embalmed-beef outrages or similar things, there is nothing in this bill to prohibit any soldier from writing to his newspaper or his folks and the newspaper exposing that fact?

Mr. WEBB. No. There is nothing in this to prohibit that, because this prohibition is confined to information regarding movements of the armed and naval forces of the United States, and expressly reserves to the public the right to criticize if their criticism does not make public information that would be useful to the enemy forbidden by the section.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Why is it assumed that any newspaper in the United States would publish information of that character that would be useful to the enemy in time of war?

Mr. WEBB. Well, why is it that this country has men in it who would be delighted to give information that would be harmful to the United States? Why is it necessary to assume that men will commit murder or counterfeit, and yet we have laws against both?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that there have been movements of troops or vessels of the United States which have been kept secret by the press?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is very true; and I want to say that I am glad the gentleman mentioned it. The prohibition that we present here is a dozen times milder than the self-imposed censorship which the reputable newspapers of this country say they will be governed by.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not better that the press of a self-governed country should impose upon itself such restrictions and not invade their constitutional rights?

Mr. WEBB. I think in time of war there are many newspapers who would not keep that self-imposed censorship, and we are invading nobody's constitutional rights.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They have been keeping it.

Mr. WEBB. Some may not keep it. The gentleman should remember that there are over 2,000 newspapers in the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The attention of the public has not yet been called to any information having been published that would be useful to the enemy.

Mr. WEBB. Not yet; but when something begins to "break" in this country, when men are striving for news, some of them, I fear, are not going to abide by these self-imposed restraints, which only a few papers have agreed to.

The vast body of newspapers in this country have never agreed to any such censorship, and some of them will not abide by it if they get a big piece of news that they want to publish.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman refers to these provisions as being moderate. Is it not a fact that under the sections newspapers are prohibited from publishing anything lawfully that has to do with matters connected with the war unless the President has specifically authorized it?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. MONDELL. Then what does this language mean?

And the President may from time to time by proclamation declare the character of such above-described information which, in his opinion, is not useful to the enemy, and thereupon it shall be lawful to publish the same.

Mr. WEBB. Exactly.

Mr. MONDELL. It is unlawful to publish anything relative to the war unless the President proclaims it as being lawful.

Mr. WEBB. I do not yield to my friend to make any such statement. It is not in the bill. We propose that Congress prohibit the publishing of the movement, disposition, or numbers of the armed forces of the United States in a military or naval operation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend for a question, but I want to get on and say something about the bill if I can.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will wait.

Mr. WEBB. No; go ahead.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to know if the gentleman really believes the statement he made in the first part of his remarks, that a man who could not support this measure would be in favor of having information conveyed to the enemy?

Mr. WEBB. No; I did not say that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman said what would be interpreted that way.

Mr. WEBB. Of course, I do not mean or say that. But I mean this, that what is prohibited here is the willful publication of information concerning the armed forces of the United States in military or naval operations which would be useful to the enemy. Now, if you vote that down, you can construe your act just as you please.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not yield. I have only four minutes. In those four minutes I want to have read from the desk a recent editorial in the New York World, which shows that the honest newspapers of this country ought to advocate such censorship as this, and that worse times may come if the war gets a little fiercer than it is now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman give the date of that editorial which he proposes to have read?

Mr. WEBB. I think it is May 26.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There have been several editorials in the World on that subject.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I know there have—all of them sensible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUMPHREYS). The Chair will inform the gentleman from North Carolina that he has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I will take the time to have this editorial read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPIES AND CENSORSHIP.

It is announced by the Navy Department that four days before the American destroyer fleet arrived abroad the German Government knew that the ships were on their way; it knew the British port to which they were going, and it was able to mine the entrance to the port the day before their arrival.

How this information reached Berlin nobody knows; but if the opponents of a sane censorship, in Congress and out of Congress, are to have their way, all such information may be put openly in the hands of every German spy in the United States. All German and pro-German newspapers, all German and pro-German news agencies, are to be privileged to spread it broadcast in order that no German agent shall be kept in ignorance. No matter how flagrant such publication, no matter what disasters may befall the country in consequence of it, it is all to be justified as a manifestation of the "freedom of the press."

In the opinion of our neighbor, the Tribune, the only object that the President could have in seeking to protect such military secrets as the sailing of the destroyer fleet would be to bring about a suppression of the newspapers in order that he "may hereafter dictate public policies without peril of domestic criticism." In the opinion of the amiable and benevolent * * * it is a "vicious" thing that the President should have power to define the character of military information that would be useful to the enemy. Evidently that is a matter which can be safely left to the German spies in the United States. They at least will know what information is likely to be useful, and all the agencies of publicity which wish to cooperate with them would have license and full immunity if * * * views were to prevail.

Such views will not prevail, however, no matter what the fate of the censorship bill may be. Unless the Government is authorized to employ moderate methods of safeguarding its military secrets it will inevitably resort to drastic methods under its war powers, and those war powers, if used to their fullest extent, are the most devastating weapon that can be turned against a free press. Why invite its use? Why insist upon its use? Why leave the newspapers exposed to the penalties of treason, however innocent their error may be? Why leave them at the mercy of army commanders, as they were in the Civil War? If that is "freedom of the press," then the World knows little about freedom of the press.

So far as the World is concerned, it is for the kind of freedom of the press that protects all the legitimate rights of the newspapers and the people, but it is not for the kind of freedom of the press that furthers the work of every German spy and aids him in obtaining military information that can be used against the American people. It is for a sane censorship and against a condition of news chaos which will inevitably drive the Government to processes of law that place the patriotic newspaper in the same class with every treasonable sheet that may be printed for the benefit of the enemies of the United States.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield for a question from the gentleman from Wisconsin—just a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not directed the attention of the House to what I regard as a very material change as to the use of the mails, not only as to letters but newspapers, in Title XII, which excludes from the mails matters that are intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by this act declared unlawful. I consider that provision of such a drastic character that it could be utilized so as to exclude from the mails any newspaper that might even suggest a course of action that would be in a way consonant with public duty, and yet which, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, might be in opposition to the provisions of this bill. For instance, we have passed a conscription law. It is now the law of the land——

Mr. WEBB. I hope my friend will not make a speech in my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is now the law of the land. Supposing a newspaper should advocate that persons were not obliged under the circumstances to volunteer in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, but should advise them to wait until the conscription law took effect. That would be in contravention of section 3 of Title I, and the newspaper or letter by this provision would be nonmailable.

Mr. WEBB. It is a criminal offense now to conspire to violate the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not conspiracy, but this provision would give the Postmaster General the power to make regulations to exclude from the mails newspapers that publish something in opposition to what the Postmaster General considered to be good public policy.

Mr. WEBB. In violation of the provisions of this act.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform the House if any newspaper published anything relative to the departure of our destroyers or the port to which they were bound?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I can get an agreement with the other side——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can reserve his time, and I will take the floor. We will have no trouble about that.

Mr. WEBB. All right. Then I reserve the remainder of my time, which I believe is 45 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE].

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the provision in this bill known as the censorship section, and I trust the House will recommit the conference report to the committee of conference with instructions to strike out the same.

I am opposed to it, first, because the Constitution of our country specifically says in Article I that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," and so forth.

You will observe that this language is specific and mandatory. Congress shall make no law touching these subjects. I am unalterably opposed to setting the Constitution aside at this time for any such purpose. I feel that the fathers of our country, the men who won our liberty and independence and who wrote this Constitution, had in mind all the many arguments and reasons such as we have heard presented in support of this bill when they wrote the Constitution, and I am not at this time prepared to say they did not anticipate a condition such as we are now confronted with in our war with Germany.

I can conceive of no good reason why at this time we should enact a general law giving the President or his agents power to throttle the press of our country. I can not forget that this is the land of liberty. Yes; the land of freemen, where every man is a sovereign, so to speak, and to undertake to say that the President of our country or some one he may appoint shall have the power to say what shall and what shall not be published for the benefit of the people in relation to the present crisis is, to my mind, un-American and will result only in disaster. Have we come to the place in our history when such autocratic power is necessary to preserve our liberties? Do we need a legal guardian in the matter of publicity? God forbid that such is the truth.

I am for my country, as we all are. I have no time for traitors and conspirators against our country or our laws. I favor the severest punishment for treason, and I am glad that the same Constitution that stands as a bulwark of free speech and a free press also clearly defines treason as follows:

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

Why not, if a newspaper man should so far forget his allegiance to our country as to give aid to the enemy by the publication of certain information that would be of value to the enemy, arrest him for treason and condemn him accordingly? Do the sponsors of this censorship provision contend this could not be done? In my humble judgment it could be and should be done; but if such is not the fact, far better to suffer the consequences of the damage done by the publication by some treasonable citizen of certain information beneficial to the enemy than to trample our Constitution under foot, create an autocratic censorship absolutely contrary to every ideal of American independence and liberty. Why undertake to throttle the press of our country as a whole rather than undertake to punish the few miserable, contemptible curs that might abuse this greatest of our privileges as American citizens?

There is another reason, in my judgment, why this provision in the conference report should be defeated. It is this: There seems to be a feeling of uncertainty in the country as to the real issue between our country and Germany, and this issue is being befogged as much as possible by every enemy of the country and everyone not in sympathy with the war, and now, if we are to undertake to muzzle the press, even though the motives of the men making the attempt are inspired by the loftiest patriotism, it will add to the discontent and will be taken advantage of by every agitator in an effort to disparage the lofty purpose of our country by alleging that the war is indefensible and that the administration knows that fact and desires to shut out the light of day as reflected from the public press as to the true condition and purpose of our country. Gentlemen of the House, we can not afford to take that position. Do not let us do anything that will strengthen the enemies of our country in our midst. Let the press have liberty—not treasonable license. Nothing will result in so much disaster, in my judgment, as to have the American people feel that they are being deceived by those in power. Let the truth be known at all times, so far as our own country is concerned. Nothing is so terrible in time of war as uncertainty and the feeling in the breasts of the people that they do not know what is going on. We are all citizens of a common country, why attempt to blind a part of the people as to the truth? Let the truth be spoken through the press, and, while some errors may be committed by a few unthinking or criminally inclined editors, the great mass of the publishers of our country will be patriotic and will guard the welfare of our country in the columns of their papers; and then the man who loves the red flag will not have as a slogan, "This is no longer the land of the free. The press is muzzled and free speech denied." To give anyone the advantage of such an argument at this time, in my judgment, would be the greatest folly. Let us have a care that we do not encourage revolution in our land by committing the errors and mistakes of autocracies and despotisms. Let us continue to uphold the flag of our country as the emblem of the free in deed and in truth and preserve our constitutional rights inviolate. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, as greatly as I desire to comply with the wishes of the administration in all matters pertaining to the conduct of the war, I am unable to see the justice or wisdom of this proposed censorship of the newspapers of the country. It presents itself to my mind as a most ungracious and ungenerous return for the conspicuous loyalty and incalculable service which the daily newspapers have been and are rendering the Government. These services are so far-reaching in their nature that they are beyond all mathematical conception. The newspapers are read by millions of our people every day, and without assuming that people believe everything that they read in the newspapers, it is an undoubted fact that the minds of even the most intelligent people are very greatly influenced by the statements of fact which they read in the newspapers and the manner in which those facts are stated.

As a rule the newspapers are highly patriotic. The writers of the daily press in the nature of their employment give great attention and much thought to public affairs. The result is that such writers are as a rule somewhat in advance of the ordinary citizen in reaching conclusions as to public policies. Having reached convictions, as the newspaper press of the country did reach convictions in regard to the necessity of the present war, their influence is naturally very great upon the reading and thinking public, and thus upon everybody.

In the way of preparing the public mind for the sacrifices that must be made, and are being made, during this war in the way of greatly increased taxation, in the demand for subscriptions to enormous public loans, and, greater than all, in the sacrifices which the country will be called upon to make in the lives of thousands of its young men, the service of the newspapers of the country in steadying public opinion and placing foremost in the public thought the ideal of patriotism, and the honor and dignity of our Nation and its flag, which symbolizes all that we love, is an inestimable service that is being rendered. [Applause.]

Is it not an ungracious and ungrateful thing to do to place a law upon the statute books which voices a suspicion as to the loyalty and intelligence of the newspaper press and the newspaper writers of the country? I do not believe a law can be placed in such shape as to avoid this implied, if not direct, suspicion, which absolutely has nothing to rest upon. I believe the newspaper press of the country would cheerfully submit to the most rigorous self-imposed censorship and that that is the way in which this subject—the importance of which I do not minimize—should be handled. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the objection that I have to section 4 of this bill is that it assumes that the newspapers are less patriotic than the rest of the people of the country. I do not believe that zeal for the welfare of the Republic and all the patriotism of the country rest in those who are temporarily in places of power. [Applause.] I believe that the newspapers of the country are as zealous for the welfare of the country, are as much interested to-day in the success of the United States in the war with Germany as anybody in any place of power in the Republic, nor do I believe that newspaper publishers are either less patriotic or less wise than public officials.

I resent the imputation that the people of the United States who are engaged in the publication and distribution of news are less zealous for the safety of the country than the rest of us. Nothing has been done since the war began to justify this assault on the newspaper publishers of the United States. They have carefully guarded every bit of information that would be of use to the enemy in any way whatever. Nothing has leaked out through the newspapers that could be of value to the enemy in this time of war. If any newspaper publisher publishes any matter that is of use to the enemy prohibited in section 4 he can be prosecuted under the laws that now exist against treason. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, we have gone a long way in this controversy to further the desires of the President of the United States with reference to the prosecution of this war. There are many here who have voted for a number of measures under protest, but have reposed sufficient confidence in him to believe in his patriotism as well as his wisdom. But if this bill is predicated upon his desire I am amazed that he would undertake to so far suppress the popular expression within the limits of the present law as to strike at the alarm clock of the Nation, for that is what the press is, and I desire to say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, that when the time comes that it is necessary to muzzle the press, when it is necessary to so far inveigh against the press as to denounce and characterize it as this bill does, by indirection at least, then I say that such a thing as the perpetuation of a free government is in danger.

It is a fundamental principle and the underlying doctrine of this free Government that there shall be free speech and a free press. [Applause.] I sincerely hope that gentlemen on the other side of the aisle will rise above all political bias, as we have on this side, and even individual importunity which at this time I feel unjust, in order that there may be no suspicion as to our patriotism on this side, no finger pointed at us as going beyond the limitations of the support of the President in some of these matters. But I warn you, my friends, if we hope to continue the liberties of our Republic, if we want to be assured that no man shall come "on horseback" to muzzle the press and gag free speech, let us sink to a bottomless sea such legislation as this. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, when this House, after the able constitutional argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and the eloquent appeal for liberty from our beloved Speaker, voted by a large majority to condemn the attempt to deprive the American citizen of the priceless right of free speech and a free press, the friends of liberty everywhere rejoiced that the Congress still represented the people of the United States. [Applause.]

And yet, I regret to say it to our shame, on that same day of freedom's victory, a small minority of this House, taking advantage of empty seats, under the guise of an amendment passed on to the Senate this tyrannical measure. And now under the plausible argument of an infamous compromise the administration again demands that we crucify liberty and then, like Pilate of old, we are to wash our hands before the people and declare that we are innocent of this shameless crime.

After our Revolutionary fathers, at the close of a long seven-year war for freedom and liberty, severed and dissolved the political ties that bound them to the mother country, and established forever on the soil of a New World the first Republic, they adopted for their future guidance, in peace and in war, a written Constitution.

The first words of that charter of human rights declared and proclaimed human liberty in the language of a free people as follows:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

In that immortal declaration they further proceeded to divide government into three departments—the legislative, judicial, and executive. The legislative power to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, composing the Congress of the United States, whose exclusive duty it was to enact laws for the Republic in accordance with that Constitution.

The judicial power was placed in a bench of learned judges, whose sole duty it was to interpret and construe the laws thus passed by Congress and to fearlessly set aside all unconstitutional enactments.

The executive power was committed to the keeping of the President of the United States, whose supreme duty it was to faithfully enforce the laws so enacted by the Congress and approved by the Supreme Court. Each of these departments was to be kept forever separate and distinct. Neither was to encroach upon nor interfere with the work or duties of the other, and all were to work together in perfect harmony for the common good.

The fathers in their wisdom went further than this; they sought to effectually protect the United States against its internal enemies when they provided and proclaimed in that Constitution—

> Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

That there might never be a mistake made as to the perfect right of the people to criticize their own servants they placed in that Constitution a plain limitation upon a subservient Congress or a dictatorial Executive when they further said:

> Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

And, finally, to insure to its fullest extent the liberties of all the people, and to prevent forever the Congress from any attempt to set aside the Constitution, they provided that this great charter of the people could only be amended by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress, and that vote must be approved by three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States.

Hitherto this great Constitution of a free people has been equal and sufficient to guide the Ship of State through the breakers of a great civil war, when our foes were those of our own household. Under its beneficient provisions the private citizen has enjoyed the precious liberty of voice and pen, the country village has held unmolested its town meetings without fear or coercion.

Great cities have reviewed and criticized its public servants to the advantage of good government. Public opinion has expressed itself on every forum in every public hall, from pulpit and press, and courts of justice. A free press and free speech has been hitherto enjoyed by us as the priceless heritage of a free people. Under the protection of the Constitution the pen of the writer and the author has multiplied books on every subject of life action and government until intelligence has crowned and blessed the people of this Republic.

From a free press come millions of newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets that fall about us like the leaves of the forest, until it has become a national maxim that only an intelligent people can be a free people.

The great press of this Nation has recently aroused and awakened our people from a false sense of security, from "a life of ignoble ease," from a spirit of national decadence that was "too proud to fight" to a love of country and a holy patriotism that blazes now from every heart and assembles her sons and daughters to enter with enthusiasm upon a war for all mankind and "the democracy of the world."

And now in this hour of our greatest triumph—this birthday of a "new freedom"—we, the Congress of the United States, are urged and importuned by the executive department of the Government to enact unconstitutional laws, to place in the hands of the President unlawful powers, to grant to him the semblance of an authority to take away from the citizen the protection of the Constitution, to close the lips of the statesmen, to muzzle the press, to gag the Congress, to attempt to amend the Constitution by a mere majority of Congress and without any submission to the people and without the consent of the legislatures of the several States.

These are days of destiny that try men's souls. We have already invested our President with supreme authority over the Army and the Navy; we have given him freely billions of money and millions of men to carry on the war, and we are yet to extend to him almost unlimited credit and confidence. We are walking in untried paths, surrounded by darkness and mystery. Even the poor protection and slight benefit of a committee appointed by the Congress to consult with and advise the President has been denied to the people.

How shall these billions of money be spent?

How shall these millions of men be marshaled?

Who shall be commissioned by the President to conduct to success this great war?

Who shall compose these Army and Navy committees and make up the boards of strategy?

What pilot will conduct the good ship amid the breakers of war?

Who will walk the deck and give command?

Who will be at the wheel in these days of storm and darkness?

God help us in this hour of peril and danger not to surrender to any one man more power than that given him by the Constitution or granted by the people we serve. In the name of the immortals who wrote the Declaration of Independence, of the murdered Lovejoy, of Garrison and Phillips, of Greeley and Beecher, I protest against this illegal and unlawful attempt to deprive our country in its hour of need of the voice of public opinion and the protection of the press. Standing here in this Capitol of the people, made sacred by the blood of Sumner, who was stricken down in his seat for words uttered on the floor of Congress, I appeal to the Members of this House to save to the people their Constitution. It is the last fond hope of the world. If we lose this, we have lost all. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the present crisis in the life of this Nation demands not only the physical support of its citizens of military age by enlistment in the Army and Navy, but a united effort by all citizens to coordinate and utilize the mental, moral, and physical resources of the country to defeat the enemy and vindicate the sovereignty of the Nation. It is not necessary, however, to abrogate the constitutional rights of our own citizens under the pretense of defending the country against Prussianism; that is not national defense, but national suicide.

In his great speech before the Supreme Court of the United States in Milligan's case, Jeremiah S. Black, in pressing upon the court the constitutional rights of his client, who had been sentenced to be hung by a military commission, although having no connection with the Army or Navy, said:

> It is precisely in time of war and civil commotion that we should double the guards upon the Constitution. If the sanitary regulations which defend the health of a city are ever to be relaxed, it ought certainly not to be done when pestilence is abroad.
> When the Mississippi shrinks within its natural channel and creeps lazily along the bottom the inhabitants of the adjoining shore have no need of a dike to save them from inundation, but when the booming flood comes down from above and swells into a volume which rises high above the plain on either side, then a crevasse in the levee becomes a most serious thing. So in peaceable and quiet times our legal rights are in little danger of being overborne, but when the wave of arbitrary power lashes itself into violence and rage and goes surging up against the barriers which were made to confine it, then we need the whole strength of an unbroken Constitution to save us from destruction.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the most momentous and epoch-making decision in the history of this Nation, followed the reasoning and argument of Judge Black and discharged the prisoner, thereby putting an end to the reign of terror which had prevailed in this Capital and in the Northern States during almost the whole period of the Civil War.

Where do you get any authority for abridging the freedom of the press or the right of free speech? This conference report provides that certain things may be published whenever the President shall by proclamation choose to permit you to do so. We do not have to go to the President to get permission to publish our views. If any man communicates any information that is of advantage to the enemy for military purposes and is of disadvantage to this Nation in time of war, he can be punished under existing laws of the United States and other provisions of this bill for giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

This covers that proposition fully. The Constitution simply says thou shalt not pass any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. It does not say that you can enact legislation that may be satisfactory to this branch of the Government or the other branch of the Government, or even to the Congress itself. This inhibition was placed in the Constitution to protect the people against Congress as well as against every other branch of the Government, and all branches combined.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Did not the gentleman vote for the Gard amendment?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, I did; and I have grave doubts about the correctness of that vote, I will say to the gentleman. I have studied this question somewhat since I cast that vote. I voted for Mr. GRAHAM's motion to strike out the original proposition which was reported here by the committee, which was infamous. The Gard amendment was reported out hurriedly to fill up the gap in the bill, and it was not given consideration by the committee. I got a copy of it and studied it for a few minutes, and then voted for it, but I have grave doubts about whether Congress had any power even to pass that, and that was much less objectionable than this, I will say to the gentleman. [Applause.]

By the proviso at the end of this section 4 of Title I, we are granted the gracious permission to discuss, comment on, and criticize the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives and to publish such comments and criticisms "if such discussion, comment, and criticism does not disclose information with respect to the movement, number, description, or disposition of the men in the Army or Navy." How can helpful discussion or criticism be indulged in without disclosing information relative to the subject discussed?

The way to prevent military information from reaching the enemy is to refuse to disclose such information to the newspapers or anyone else outside of the Military Establishment.

If we have to go to the Commander in Chief of the Army in order to exercise the rights which the framers of our Constitution undertook to guarantee by providing a prohibition against interference with that right, then I think we are coming upon evil days in this land of the free. It seems to me that you are undertaking to legislate on a proposition that you have no right to legislate upon—no right whatever. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I regret to find myself in disagreement with the very splendid chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, but in all honesty to myself, as I have told him—and I think he appreciates it—I can not accept the language framed by the conferees in the new section 4 of this conference report. On the 4th of May this House adopted an amendment which had three controlling features. One was that the President of the United States might, in an emergency resulting from war or from the imminence of war, declare that emergency to exist and in that proclamation prescribe reasonable rules for the publication of matters affecting the national defense which might be useful to the enemy. It also provided that in the submission of the case the jury must find not alone that the publication was made, but that it was in fact useful to the enemy. It was the purpose of this amendment to safeguard the rights of all men, to give to newspapers and newspaper publishers no greater right of publication of matter than should be afforded to the most humble citizen in the fullest right of free speech. However, I differentiate very decidedly between the language of that amendment and the language written into this bill by the conferees. The particular language which I object to in the report of the conferees is that the President is not called upon to make a declaration of reasonable rules for the publication of matters affecting the national defense which may be useful to the enemy, but that the absolute power is given to the President to withhold all information concerning the movement, numbers, description, or distribution of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations or in respect to any of the works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which information is useful to the enemy, unless he shall first issue a proclamation and determine by that proclamation the character of such above-described information which in his opinion is not useful to the enemy, and thereupon it shall be lawful to publish the same.

I do not think the question of authority under the Constitution authorizing the President to make reasonable rules and regulations for the carrying on of war can be held to include every publication which a newspaper can make. As I read this language—and I try to read it intelligently; I have given a great deal of consideration to the matter—if it means anything at all it means that before any publication can be made of anything pertaining to the movement of troops or our fortifications the approval of the President must first be had. I assume that this is a provision which no man would want, and I am sure the present Chief Executive of the United States would not desire this burden of being compelled every time a publication is to be made concerning the movement of troops to issue a proclamation saying whether or not in his opinion it is of such a character as is not useful to the enemy, and that thereupon the newspapers may publish it. Then, standing to the fullest for the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, I yet realize that there may be newspapers—fortunately very few in number I believe they are—that might seek to transgress rules for the government of our national welfare and in that light such regulations restricting them or prohibiting them in a sense should be agreed to and should be in the law but certainly the time is not here—and I trust it never will be here—when it is necessary to have the authority of a proclamation of the President of the United States before a newspaper can print anything at all concerning matters which may be of the most vital public importance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to grant me five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. The matter has now gotten into this condition. Section 4, as it appears in this conference report, is a compromise section which contains so many different ideas that I myself do not believe it presents a workable, legal conclusion. I do not go so far as to say that it contravenes the Constitution of the United States, because I believe the Constitution affords ample authority to pass any law which may be necessary to carry on successfully the warfare in which the United States is engaged, and I do not go so far as to attack the constitutionality of the basic principle of regulation, since I firmly believe in the basic principle of regulation, as I believe in the right of free speech and the freedom of the press. I believe in one as much as in the other, but we are now going far beyond that, and the gist of this amendment is to assume that everything is improper to be published unless the President of the United States shall say it is of such a character as is not useful to the enemy.

The newspapers of the United States perform a great function. Not alone in the large cities and crowded centers of the country but everywhere throughout the length and breadth of this Nation they bring the news to the people, and the people are entitled through them to a full and fair discussion of all governmental acts. The people are entitled to all the information which carries no danger to our national defense and which is not useful to the enemy, and we must adhere to this time-honored rule of the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. We must first say that the freedom of the press be not abridged unless some reason, some military exigency exists why the matter should not be published, but we should not adopt the rule that nothing should be published until it is made public by proclamation that it should be published. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I will if I have the time.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman recognizes the fact that this inhibition is only to the movement of troops and the question of fortifications——

Mr. GARD. I do; I recognize that.

Mr. DYER. Nothing shall be published concerning that unless the President gives it out and says it is proper.

Mr. GARD. Yes; and that is what I object to. If it means anything else than that, it means nothing at all and should not be a part of the bill. If it means what I think it means, it means that nothing pertaining to the movement of troops, numbers, descriptions, or disposition of any of the armed forces shall be made public unless the President says that it is of such a character as will not be useful to the enemy.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is mistaken about that. It is a question of determining——

Mr. GARD. No; I am not mistaken. The gentleman is now referring to the control. I am referring to the proclamation of the President, because I do not think the President of the United States desires to be burdened with the necessity of making proclamations every day or two to the newspaper men of the country and say that certain information is not of a character to be useful to the enemy.

Mr. DYER. But the gentleman will agree that the President is responsible to the people of the United States for the troops and the ships.

Mr. GARD. Certainly he is.

Mr. DYER. And for their safety, as far as possible.

Mr. GARD. The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and we should provide him with every reasonable and proper means to carry on this war to a successful and hasty conclusion, and I have stood and will stand for everything calculated to do that thing; but I do not think the President of the United States wants the burden of being compelled to say by his proclamation to any newspaper in Cleveland or in Chicago or in Cincinnati or elsewhere in these United States that you shall publish nothing at all of these matters unless he, as the President of the United States, issue a proclamation and says that it is not of a character to be useful to the enemy; otherwise punishment is the penalty.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. WEBB. The language of the amendment adopted by the House, called the Gard amendment, which the gentleman drew, says:

> And the President is hereby authorized to declare by a proclamation the existence of such national emergency and is hereby authorized from time to time by proclamation to declare the character of such information which is or may be useful to the enemy.

Mr. GARD. And I adhere to that.

Mr. WEBB. Is not a much bigger burden put upon the President by that?

Mr. GARD. No; the idea in my amendment was that the President in an emergency could do this. Now, this goes further and says that when the United States is at war then all this information shall not be published. My amendment says in any emergency, in time of war or imminence of war, which emergency shall first be declared by proclamation that a national emergency exists for the defense of the country. Then the President is to make regulation as to what should not be published. There is no criminal statute—and this is a criminal statute, and you must give it its full force and effect—which carries a provision that everything shall be prohibited—only that certain named things are prohibited.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. The idea of this law or other similar law should be that a reasonable regulation should be made when the national emergency calls for it. I do not subscribe to the language of this amendment that the President shall issue a proclamation before any publication of public matters shall be lawful. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have a minute more.

Mr. MANN. I would like to yield the gentleman further time, but I can not do it, much to my regret. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yield some of his time?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], a member of the committee.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this morning when I asked if I or the Republican side would be able to get any time under the arrangement that was proposed, I was told that the Republicans had caucused or had some kind of a meeting or conference, and that no Republican ought to stand up and vote to support this measure. I said then, Mr. Speaker, and I say now, that it is a greater duty in this hour and at this time of distress to stand up and support your country as your conscience dictates than it is to take orders from any caucus or conference of any political party. [Applause.] I am in favor of this measure. I am in favor of it because it will enable the President to protect my fellow Americans who have to traverse the seas to France and fight for their country. And to say that the newspapers shall be permitted to publish the movements of ships, to say that the newspapers shall be permitted to publish the fact that a ship has sailed which is loaded with Americans for this foreign land, to say that the Navy has sent out its transports or its battleships carrying the precious blood burden of American citizenship is wrong. It is wrong to say that the President can not prohibit the publication of that.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I can not yield. He can permit it. He can say, in other words, that it can be given out.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DYER. No; I can not yield to the gentleman now. I will yield in a minute if I have the time.

But, Mr. Speaker, there has been no crime committed if a newspaper goes ahead and publishes the movements of the troops, unless the jury finds that it was willfully committed. The President does not determine whether there has been a crime committed or not. Gentlemen, you will be mighty sorry if you allow your partisanship and desire to obtain a political advantage in a matter of this kind when your country's interests are at stake, where the lives of your fellow men are in the balance. If you are going to allow upon the one hand political exigencies to sweep aside your patriotic duty at this hour, you are unworthy to be in this House of Representatives.

We do not know how soon transports will be crossing the waters with soldiers. We do not know how soon information may be given out if this prohibition is not put in, and it may result in the lives of thousands of American citizens being sacrificed. Talk about constitutional liberty, talk about the sacrifice of personal liberty, the right of free speech! Gentlemen, there is nothing in this about that. There is no attack upon it, and I do not believe that any great portion of the press of this country to-day is opposed to this simple provision in this bill contained in section 4. Read, section 3, right above it. Does that not prohibit the giving out of any information? It says that false reports or false statements given out with reference to the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 20 years, or both. That is a more severe penalty, and yet none of you are rising up in your seats and speaking against that. No; because that does not take in the great press of the country. The press is great, and in the main it is a good press. I am standing here to-day and taking my position honestly, as I believe I ought to take it, for my country first, last, and all the time, and in defiance of the fact that in my district there are six great daily newspapers published that are as good as any in the land. They do not ask me to sacrifice my duty, as I see it, for my country in time of war. No; and no other newspapers are asking it. None of them are asking it. Of course they do not like any law passed that in any way or manner reflects upon them, and neither do citizens. But laws are passed, and they are passed for protection in war time of the men who must go to war.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman mistake the fact that section 3 provides that no false statements shall be made, and the further fact that section 4, as reported by the conferees, provides that no statement whatever shall be published unless the President says so?

Mr. DYER. Only in reference to the operations of the troops, and then it must be useful to the enemy, and then there can be no conviction unless it is found to be both willful and false.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman explain the meaning of the words "disposition" and "description"? Will he explain that they do not connote everything that relates to the armed forces of the United States, their health and their welfare, and so forth?

Mr. WEBB. That is the very language the gentleman offered on the floor of the House.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman will bear in mind that I offered it tentatively, and that it must be subject to study and direction by war-trained minds.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman offered it on the floor of the House, and it was beaten. The exact language is here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. WEBB. I want to yield five minutes, or ten minutes, if he desires, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would rather not speak on this subject, in view of what has taken place in a Republican conference. I hate very much to differ from my party associates. The House knows my views pretty well on this particular question, and a speech seems quite unnecessary. I believe we ought to have a section of this kind in the bill. I can not yield my judgment to that of my party associates or to the newspapers of this country.

The day will come when we begin to send our troops across the water. Then we shall be anxious about their safety. If they are sent to the bottom of the sea as a result of information obtained contrary to a provision like this, how shall we feel if we cut it out of this bill to-day? How will this country feel if they realize that we have been trifling with this matter? Indeed, it seems to me that is what we are doing. It is utterly ridiculous for anybody to contend that this provision is unconstitutional.

Read the second and third sections of this bill. Those sections prohibit free speech if this does. They prohibit giving certain information, telling your enemy certain things. This is only another way of telling the enemy. Have we any power to stop that? No one contends that the second and third sections are unconstitutional. There is no question about our right to enact this kind of legislation. We send men to jail in every State in the Union for libel. A libel is a written or printed statement published to the injury of some person. What is here forbidden is a published statement to the injury of our country; that is what we are trying to prohibit.

It seems to me we have limited this section in every way so as to absolutely protect anybody who wants to do the right thing. It can not affect the newspapers that are honest, those who have the public interests at heart. It can only reach those who are trying to do us an injury. And why should we not punish those? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I feel that we can not afford for any outside consideration, no matter what it is, to neglect to provide for the safety of the boys whom we are going to send across the sea, and that is all this will do.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Why would it not be the best way to safeguard the boys who are sent across the sea for the Executive to withhold any information concerning it from the newspapers or anybody else?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, there are the harbors, where embarkation will take place——

Mr. GORDON. But the Commander in Chief can prohibit anybody approaching the docks.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The newspapers can gather up that kind of information, regardless of any Executive order, and print it. If that is a lawful print, as it would be if you leave this section out, the newspaper carrying it can go into a foreign ship and from the foreign ship by wireless across the ocean and thus reach the enemy long before it could be communicated in any other fashion. A newspaper published here containing that kind of information, may be sent abroad by way of Mexico. From there it can be sent by wireless to reach Germany, or to Austria, if Austria becomes our enemy. Why should we permit this to be done? You are permitting a thing that is dangerous to our safety.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the Dominion of Canada has no censorship law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not know whether they have any censorship law in the Dominion of Canada or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet hundreds of thousands of troops have been shipped from Victoria across the continent, and no mention was made in the local papers. Does not the gentleman believe that the American press is just as loyal and can be trusted just as safely as the Canadian press?

Mr. CARLIN. That was before the submarines had charge of the sea.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was during the submarine warfare. In fact, I saw those troops in Victoria.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is claimed that the newspapers are so good that they need no law and ought not to be restrained. I do not take any stock in that; they are no better than the rest of us. The newspapers should be as much subject to the law as the individual. If they publish anything that endangers the safety of the country, or the safety of our soldiers when we send them across the sea, we ought to have a way to punish them.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the existing law punish newspapers the same as anybody else that gives aid and comfort to the enemy?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The newspapers are punished, not especially for publishing, which is their special method of endangering the public safety. If the editors do certain other things, they may be punished, but there is no law under which the publication of the things described in this section is made a crime.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman spoke of the liability of publications in American newspapers reaching our enemy. On the other hand, when the destroyer flotilla crossed the ocean America got the information not from our newspapers, but from Germany. They got it in Germany while our papers were silent about it.

Mr. DYER. This section applies to individuals as well as newspapers. Suppose a newspaper published the movement of a ship going out to sea, a transport, and by reason of that publication the enemy sinks the transport and drowns the men on board. Would there be any punishment unless this section were agreed to?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; not unless you could show that the editor had published it and put the publication into the hands of the enemy. It would then come under another section. This section is designed to prevent publications of a character that are likely to reach the enemy and that are likely to be injurious to the country.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CROSSER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the different matter in this bill, Title XII. This is the language of that title:

Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

In the next section it says that—

Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing of any kind containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

Now, the Postmaster General could hold any man here delivering a speech against the war—a thing which I did not do—that prompted another man to write a letter urging resistance to the law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not going to discuss that feature at present.

Mr. CROSSER. If you could prevent a speech from going into the mails, could you not prevent a newspaper from carrying a report of the speech?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We might, and in a proper case we ought to.

Mr. CROSSER. This is a vital matter here. It strikes at the root of free speech.

If the Postmaster General, for example, can sit in his office and say, "In my opinion this is calculated to make men urge resistance to the law," then he can bar the letter or newspaper from the mails, and it might be perfectly inoffensive and harmless.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Pardon me, but I do not want to let the gentleman make a speech in my time.

Mr. CROSSER. No; but I am very much in earnest about this and believe that it is a serious matter.

Mr. ROSE. Suppose this bill becomes a law in its present shape, would it be possible for the public to be made acquainted with conditions as to the hospital ships of this country?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is nothing to interfere with that at all. I want to call attention to the nature of this prohibition. It is so limited that I fear it is not near as broad as it ought to be. For instance, we are sending ex-Secretary Root across the ocean to Russia. This section is not broad enough to protect Mr. Root on that mission. It is not broad enough, for instance, to have protected Gen. Joffre when he was coming over here and when he was returning. It does not cover the sailing of persons or ships in trade. It is simply the movement of armed forces in military or naval operations that are covered. It is confined exclusively to that, and to the defense of some particular place. It seems to me we ought to be willing to do at least that much. Instead of prohibiting the publication of information with reference to sickness or the equipment or character of troops, as the provision did which passed the House, we have cut all that out. We permit all sorts of criticism. Our chief and almost only aim is to prevent the publication of information as to the movement of troops in military or naval operations. We are anxious to prevent the publication of information in regard to the movement of ships carrying our troops across the ocean. Should we not do that to protect our boys? Can we afford to do less?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the provisions in the original bill and for the Gard amendment, but I am not willing at this time to vote for the present language brought in by the conferees. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] in his criticism of that language, in that it requires the President to designate in advance what information shall be deemed lawful for the newspapers to publish. It does not appear to me that the President is going to exercise that power in person; and while I might be willing to commit such a power to the President if it could be personally exercised, I have no anticipation that it will be.

But I do not want to put my present opposition to this provision upon the technical ground of the wording of it, for after considerable study of the situation I am convinced that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to draw a satisfactory provision for a censorship of the press consistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Men say that the enemy may get knowledge of the movement of troops or of the defenses of the Nation through publication in the press. I am inclined to believe that the enemy who get that knowledge will not get it in that way. Men who seem to think that the only knowledge of the movement of troops or of public defenses is what appears in the public press have not read since their school days the classic story of Paul Revere:

And lo! as he looks, on the belfry's height
A glimmer, and then a gleam of light!
He springs to the saddle, the bridle he turns,
But lingers and gazes, till full on his sight
A second lamp in the belfry burns!

A hurry of hoofs in a village street,
A shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark,
And beneath, from the pebbles, in passing, a spark
Struck out by a steed flying fearless and fleet;
That was all! And yet, through the gloom and the light,
The fate of a nation was riding that night;
And the spark struck out by that steed in his flight
Kindled the land into flame with its heat.

And that is the way of men who give military information about the movements of the enemy the world around. [Applause.] As soon as a movement is determined upon, the wireless, the Paul Revere of to-day, flashes it 3,000 miles. The legitimate press of this country, under the voluntary censorship which it placed upon itself, did not publish the movement of the American fleet of destroyers that went abroad, but the enemy had knowledge of that, although the American people had not. So I imagine it is going to be rather difficult to draw a provision which will reach the evils sought to be reached here.

But I have another objection, which has come to me in the study of this situation. We have passed a law to conscript a certain number of the sons of the families of this land, to put them into the Army and possibly to send many of them abroad. I can not think of a greater mistake, a thing which would militate more in certain emergencies against strong, valiant public confidence throughout this country, than a provision that no information should be given out except by the will of the Executive as to the movement or condition of these troops.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know from his reading of history that effective results in all wars have been had by reason of the ability to conceal from the enemy the movement of troops?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it is wise strategy to permit the publication of information of the movement of troops in such a way as that that knowledge can reach the enemy?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not that——

Mr. BORLAND. Let me answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not that equivalent to saying, "We will be here at this point on a certain day. Come out and fight us there"?

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will sit down in his seat and read section 2 he will find the most drastic penalties upon anybody who communicates or is instrumental in communicating that information to the enemy. But the information does not go to the enemy through the public press; never has since the existence of the press, and never will.

Mr. RUCKER. Then what harm can this do?

Mr. MONDELL. Did the gentleman ever hear of a commanding officer who gained his knowledge of the movements of the enemy from the newspapers?

Mr. BORLAND. I never heard of one.

Mr. WEBB. I have always heard that Admiral Semmes got his information from the newspapers as to the movement of merchant ships, and that he thereby destroyed more merchant ships than any other man who ever sailed on the ocean.

Mr. BORLAND. I never heard of but one commander who acted on newspaper information, and that was the American commander who attacked San Diego, Cal., in 1846, while it was still Mexican territory, on the supposition, gained from reading a Mexican newspaper, that we had declared war against Mexico. He found out that he was 60 days ahead of the declaration of war. That is the only man I ever heard of who based his military movements on information contained in the public press. I think it would be unwise at this time to discourage public confidence by refusing to allow information in regard to these movements to be published in the public press. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, the section now being considered reads:

When the United States is at war, the publishing willfully of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which information is useful to the enemy, is hereby prohibited.

Then, anticipating and answering the concluding part of the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] who just preceded me, the section further provides:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same, if such discussion, comment, or criticism does not disclose information herein prohibited.

I would like to ask some gentleman, Mr. Speaker, to give the House some good reason why we should not enact the provisions I have just read into law. Gentlemen draw finespun theories about the Constitution. Some are alarmed for fear the press of this country might be muzzled, so to speak. They have such a holy horror of muzzling the press that they are not willing to vote for a provision in this bill making it unlawful for the press to willfully betray the movements of our war forces to our enemy; and yet but recently every Member who has spoken here to-day in opposition to this section, by his vote, authorized the proclamation which will be enforced next Tuesday, when millions of our boys will register and from those who register a million or more of them will be drafted, many of them to cross the water and go into a foreign land to fight for that flag. Oh, gentlemen, some of you constitutional lawyers voted a few days ago for language quite as drastic as the language now before us, but to-day you have serious doubts about the constitutionality of such enactment. You constitutional lawyers seem to be afraid of the press. I do not own any part of the press, and I am not owned by the press, and never will be. [Applause.]

I say to you that when it comes to protecting those boys who will be dragged from the homes of the patriotic people of this country I would muzzle the press until doomsday, if necessary, rather than sacrifice the blood of one of those boys. [Applause.] The acts prohibited by this section are acts which might result in thousands of our patriotic boys, boys who are loyal to the flag, finding a burial place at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean. Oh, gentlemen, give the press the right to publish these things if you will, but for myself I will vote to muzzle the press in my effort to save and protect the lives of American soldier boys.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; but the gentleman knows that I can not agree with him on anything involving either religion, politics, whisky, or legislation, but I will gladly yield to my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman want to argue prohibition?

Mr. RUCKER. I will sometime, but we can not engage in that discussion now.

Mr. MEEKER. Can the gentleman name one single instance——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I regret I have not time to hear the gentleman's question and answer it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, it has been urged that this section 4, under Title I, is already provided for otherwise by law. If that is true, it is mere repetition and can do no harm. If it attempts to reach something that is not provided for, it is a useful measure. In one sentence they assert section 4 is unconstitutional. In the next they declare to commit the offenses it enumerates would be treason, punishable with death. What sophistry is this? I do not know how the rest of you feel, gentlemen of the committee, but, as far as I am concerned, if I have got to choose between the friendship of the metropolitan press and the safety of the American soldier, so help me God, there is only one way for me to decide. [Applause.]

I had the honor to read law with John P. Usher, a stalwart Republican, Secretary of the Interior in Lincoln's Cabinet. On one occasion, when the old soldiers in our county bolted and nominated an Old Soldier Ticket—I never knew whether Usher bolted or not—but as he took his hat, an old man of 75, and went to the polls, he said, "Mr. Lincoln said we must always remember the men who went to the front." Gentlemen of the committee, we must quit thinking about what is going to happen to us at home and begin to think about what is going to happen to the boys that will soon be sent to Europe. If we fail to enact this legislation and thereby the Germans sink one transport, or we lose one company or one single, solitary soldier, no man that voted against it could ever rest easy in his bed again.

I am as much opposed as any man to a domineering censorship, to these continual grants of unlimited power, but this section is now down to a reasonable basis. These soldiers must be protected as they move. This is no time to quibble about technicalities. Where is the newspaper that arrogates to itself a constitutional right to willfully publish news of the number, movement, and disposition to be made of the men we send to war, that would be useful to the enemy? You might as well claim a constitutional right to libel. Before anyone could be convicted under this law you have to prove that the information he published was useful to the enemy. You have to prove that it was willfully published. I was among the first in this House to insist on a real jury trial under this section. Now we have it. These precautions are fair and just. Is there any man in this House that would wish to see a man acquitted who willfully published information that was useful to the enemy? No patriot would do that; no man in the House would say that. I voted with you against the Gard amendment. Now Mr. GARD himself opposes this section because the principle on which we opposed his plan no longer applies. Why continue to fight after the battle is won?

No; do not rise to interrupt me. I am allowed but three minutes to speak for the men who will go down to the sea in ships, as DYER and I did, to fight under the same flag my comrade and I fought under in 1898 and 1899. We are quibbling about technicalities. Abraham Lincoln sent men through the Confederate lines for offenses no greater than section 4 seeks to check, and the Constitution survived the shock. Under this measure the President can say certain things can be published, but he can not say what can not be published. His proclamation takes away no right. Indeed, a man might escape a willful utility to the enemy by some inadvertent phrase in the proclamation. That clumsy sentence in section 4 amounts to nothing, means nothing. They say to the press you can not tell what disposition will be made of our troops; you can not notify German spies here how the boys are armed and equipped, in what numbers they go to battle, and what movements they make. For the love of God, is there a newspaper so crazy that it wants to do anything of that kind? This section 4 specifically provides the papers may discuss and criticize the acts and policies of the Government. Its only restraint is on publishing harmful military news.

The newspapers of the country had enough to do with bringing on the war. What of its burdens are they carrying? Our loyal people are not clamoring for news that will be useful to those who fight our sons. Everybody else has to make some sacrifices, and it is time that the newspapers make some sacrifice. The abyss of time opens before us, and in it we shall bury many valued privileges, many garnered billions, and our splendid sons, the fondest hope of this mighty Republic. Let every patriot lay his offering on the altar. The drums beat and the bugles sound "Forward with The Flag." The time has come to

> Nail to the mast her holy flag,
> Set every threadbare sail,
> And give her to the god of storms,
> The lightning and the gale!

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I desire to present some views with respect to this fourth section, and I do so in the same spirit as that of the gentleman from North Carolina, our chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who having a conscientious regard for his duty, when he uttered the sentiments concerning this section which he holds, called upon everybody that was patriotic and who wanted to serve his country, to vote for this fourth section of Title I in this bill. I wish, with the same earnestness and the same sincerity, to ask every man who is a patriot, every man who loves his country and who wants to see the welfare of the country promoted, to vote to strike out this section as it is now worded. No man in this House will go further in upholding without regard to politics or any other consideration the hands of the President of the United States in prosecuting this war. Having voted for his proclamation of war, and having voted for the selective draft, I pledged myself thereby to do all that may be done by a man or a Member of Congress to promote the President's work in bringing this war to a successful issue, but I want to say to you, my friends, that this section is not calculated to help to influence or bring about that result. This section is a pernicious section and does not accomplish what I think perhaps the members of the conference committee hoped to accomplish by its adoption. One gentleman said a moment ago, "Why, I am told that other parts of this bill would enable you to punish anybody that published information that was useful to the enemy." "Then," said he, "if that is so, why not pass section 4 also, for it can do no harm." Therein lies the vice of his reasoning, and when he reflects he will understand that this is so, and I am sure he will vote, for he is an honest man, to strike out this section. There are other sections of this title, the first and second, under which the obtaining of many things and any information connected with the national defense to benefit or aid the enemy is made a crime, and in the second section the publication of any information with reference to the national defense for the same purpose is made a crime for which the man who willfully and intentionally and with the purpose of aiding the enemy, which facts must be found by the jury, publishes the information, shall be punished under the severe penalties that are prescribed in those sections.

No man can sit down and sanely and fairly read these two sections without arriving at the conclusion that there is ample power for the punishment of any villainous newspaper that would attempt to publish anything for the benefit of the enemy; but I want to ask your attention, my friends, to this distinction. A publication might be alleged to be one that gave information to the enemy, and, in fact, to some degree might do so, and yet be a subject that the papers of the country as a free press and the men of the country in the exercise of their freedom of speech ought to discuss, and the question would be, Is it more harmful than beneficial? It may be something that would give information to the enemy, but at the same time if left without exposure it might bring a calamity upon one's own country. Under such circumstances, who is to muzzle the press or who is to leave it to the jury to say whether or not on the single and exclusive issue that it is helpful to the enemy, for that is what alone is left outside of "willful publication" to the jury to try? I say that the statement made by my colleague [Mr. GARD] is worthy of the serious attention of the Members of this House upon both sides of the aisle. His amendment passed by this House was infinitely superior to the one that this conference committee has brought forth. This is a mongrel production; it is neither one thing nor the other, and when you read it honestly and squarely as between man and man you must say that the condition of the press, the condition not alone of the press but of every individual Member of this House and of every citizen, will be tenfold worse under this conference report than it could possibly be under the amendment that the House adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. Why do I say that? When you read the first paragraph of section 4 you find a prohibition upon giving information respecting the things enumerated which is of use to the enemy—that is clear—that will be useful to the enemy upon the certain enumerated topics; but the language that is used in describing those topics, namely, "description," and so forth, is so broad that it will cover everything connected with these particular subjects and make the publisher amenable to punishment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not until I have finished the analysis of that section. Then I shall be glad to yield. The next paragraph provides that the President shall from time to time—no; not shall, even, but may—that the President may from time to time designate what may be published. Ergo, whatever he does not designate is forbidden. Then think of the muzzle in the concluding section, which has been amended since it left the House, wherein it attempts to provide the constitutional right of criticism and free speech but winds up with the sting in the end, where it says provided it is not something that is "prohibited in this section." Suppose the President made no proclamation of what might be published; then, I ask you, what could a paper say? Would not everything be prohibited? Then, in an attempt to preserve the freedom of the press it provides that only those things may be criticized which are not within the prohibition of this section. The first paragraph of the section prohibits it all. The second paragraph says that the President may from time to time designate what may be published. All else remains prohibited. Then the concluding paragraph of the section provides that nothing in the section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same, and when you passed the bill you stopped there. They have added these words:

> If such discussion, comment, or criticism does not disclose information herein prohibited.

That paragraph has all of the strength taken out of it, and no lawyer will dare to argue otherwise. That eliminates the power to criticize, so far as this section goes, anything and everything that is prohibited, and when you start with the thought that the first portion of the section prohibits all publications with relation to the enumerated topics and then when you consider that the President, by refraining from ever saying that anything connected with those subjects is food for publication, you leave the whole matter prohibited, and then the press muzzler comes on, and no comment can be made upon it at all.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I said, my friends, that the press muzzler then comes on, but I am going one step further. This is not merely a question of a free press, however important that may be, but it involves also the sacred and inalienable right of an American citizen to free speech. Ase, if one of you obtained from the Department of War some information of value touching the question of the defenses or touching these matters prohibited in this bill, and you were to come to me and communicate what you had found, then unless the President had permitted that publication you would be guilty of a crime. Remember the word "publication" does not mean to print in type in a newspaper, but publication means to utter, and that which makes a thing known may be a publication just as much as a paragraph in a newspaper article.

Why you muzzle the individual who has acquired valuable knowledge the publication of which would benefit the people of the country and he would be unable to say a word upon that topic. I hold in my hand a paper, of which I presume every Member of the House has received a copy. It is a paper purporting to give a plan, the length and breadth of an amicable censorship of the press. I find on the last page that it purports to have been signed and recommended by Robert Lansing, Newton D. Baker, Josephus Daniels, and that the President of the United States, in pursuance of the plan therein set forth, has appointed the civilian member, and the heads of the departments are appointing or have appointed the other people who are to represent the Army, the Navy, and the State Departments, respectively, and they have agreed upon a plan with reference to the publication of information touching the questions of the war. They preface that paper with this remarkable quotation which I beg leave to read to you and ask from you your most earnest attention to them. On the outer cover there is this language:

> I can imagine no greater disservice to the country than to establish a system of censorship that would deny to the people of a free Republic like our own their indisputable rights to criticize their own public officials. While exercising the great powers of the office I hold I would regret in the crisis like the one through which we are now passing to lose the benefit of patriotic and intelligent criticisms.
> WOODROW WILSON.

And yet upon subjects that are vital to the issue of the war you would put into this act the power into the hands of one or two men to muzzle the speech of the press and to close the mouth of the individual critic of this Government. How can you criticize public officials, as you now propose, on the number and distribution of the troops, regarding matters of serious import, which if not exposed might bring disaster and destruction without explaining the circumstances under which that faulty distribution or treatment of the troops arose. You can not criticize without giving the facts which are the basis for your criticism. Then they quote again from President Monroe these golden words:

> The people being with us exclusively the sovereign, it is indispensable that full information be laid before them on all important subjects to enable them to exercise that high power with complete effect. (From President Monroe's message, Dec. 2, 1823.)

Let us remember, my fellow Members of Congress, that we are legislating upon a subject that is of vast and great importance. Friends will arise here and pathetically appeal about "the boys" who are going to the front, but I tell you if you close the lips of individuals to speech and criticism, if you close the power of the Argus-eyed press to disclose weaknesses or wrongs that are being perpetrated, you may inflict a thousandfold more injury and damage upon those devoted boys. I tell you the people are the sovereign, and in their war they have the right to know the facts, and the man who votes to keep the facts from them is committing a crime against the country and against those soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], a member of the committee.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], as well as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], and it is amazing to me to note how the gentlemen can entertain such different opinions as those two gentlemen have in so short a length of time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, as well as the gentleman from Ohio, voted in the Committee on the Judiciary for the original proposition contained in this bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke and voted against it here. Not content with that, Mr. Speaker, while your conferees were in session, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, together with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], sent to the conferees a censorship provision which I understood they would be willing to stand for, and I want the House, in all fairness and in truth, to see the difference between their attitude while the matter was in committee and conference and what seems to be their attitude here upon this floor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a personal question?

Mr. CARLIN. I will yield to my colleague—if I can have additional time; I only have five minutes, the gentleman understands——

The SPEAKER. The question as to whether the gentleman yields is with the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I will not yield; I would love to do so; I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have only five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I simply desire to say to the gentleman that he ought to permit the correction of a statement that is unfair to me.

Mr. CARLIN. I will do that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman would not intentionally make a statement that is not correct.

Mr. CARLIN. Certainly not.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I simply desire to say that in the endeavor to reach some harmonious result there was submitted to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary a suggestion, but the suggestion did not emanate from me, but I handed it to him and said I was not bound by it, but at the same time saying something might be dressed up out of that that would answer some objections——

Mr CARLIN. All right.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And on reflection I afterwards sat down and wrote him a letter telling him under no circumstances would those who helped to frame that suggestion nor I myself could stand for the language that was in it.

Mr. CARLIN. I am trying to show you have changed your mind a half dozen times upon this same subject.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania Then I say that you are wrong.

Mr. CARLIN I stated that in the Judiciary Committee you largely prepared, with your own hand, the provision which that committee reported to this House.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CARLIN Is not that true?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No. I mean to say that I took the first and second sections, with a whole lot of mongrel matters you had in them, and helped you whip them into shape; and it would not have been fit to pass this House if it had not been done. You declined to hold a meeting on the day that I could be there, which was one day later than the day the committee met. The committee met and reported it without my knowledge, and I did not vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. I do not wish to reflect upon the gentleman, but the gentleman is so seldom here that we usually have great difficulty in finding him.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. A man who takes refuge on a question of facts in personal remarks is not worthy of being noticed. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. It is a common and simple thing for a man who has entertained a half dozen different views upon one subject to undertake to relieve himself in the way you have. I appeal to the chairman of the committee and ask him the question whether you did not vote upon the original proposition in the committee. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that all this is out of order, and the gentleman knows it is out of order. You can not refer to how men vote in a committee.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is out of order——

Mr. MANN. Not only out of order, but not in good taste.

Mr. CARLIN. I am coming to the document that was sent to us while we were in conference. And what does it provide for? The House is entitled to know the views the gentleman entertained on these subjects at different times. His side is entitled to know, because it is largely there that his influence has been exercised. Let us see. Here is a provision that was handed to me in the conference by the chairman of the committee:

> In time of war it shall be, and is hereby declared to be, unlawful to disclose in advance to the public, and thereby to the enemy, any information with respect to the movements, numbers, description, * * * without the permission of the Secretary of the Navy or Secretary of War——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. Now, they complain of the provision in the proposed statute, which confines itself to three things—fortifications and the Army and Navy movements—and yet they suggested to us a censorship covering any matter that related to the national defense. And so, my colleagues, let me say that the Gard amendment is open to identically the same criticism. It contains the same language.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CARLIN. I will, but you were very offensive when I yielded to you before.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I thought you were offensive to me.

Mr. CARLIN. I have long ago forgiven you.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Let us mutually be forgiving, then. This is no time for anything but seriousness. I wish to state this: In the paper which you read, which I have said was not mine, nowhere is there any reference to the President declaring what may be published or not published.

Mr. CARLIN. You leave that to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Read it.

Mr. CARLIN. Will you yield me time to do it? I have only two minutes. I want to say to the side of the House that I am facing now—the Republican side—that the gentlemen whose lead you are following have on two occasions supported and sustained provisions far in excess of the power contained in the present bill, and if you want to follow that kind of leadership you are welcome to do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield one more minute to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to say in reference to the Gard amendment, and I want to call the attention of this side of the House which I am facing, because it was from there the applause came, the difference between what this amendment is and what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] himself proposed, remembering, gentlemen, that the amendment now proposed as a statute by the conferees provides simply for refusal of a permit to publish matters relating to three things—the Army, the Navy, and fortifications. And yet let us see what the Gard amendment is. The gentleman from Ohio says that he can not vote for the one now proposed. Let me see. It says that without proper authority no information shall be given that might be useful to the enemy, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in what occurred in the Judiciary Committee nor in the different opinions that were there expressed. That which is of interest to me is the immediate matter that is now before us for consideration. I voted against the original proposition that was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I voted with some hesitation for what is commonly referred to as the Gard amendment. I do not wish to cast a vote for any proposition that would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and I never intend to do it if I so understand the question when the time comes to vote. But I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am at an utter loss to understand why it is that gentlemen can possibly object to the provision that is contained in section 4 of this conference report. It seems to me that my distinguished and eloquent friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], for whose legal ability I have profound respect, has raised before us a series of possibilities and has combated them without for a single moment giving the slightest attention to the probabilities.

If I understand the provisions of section 4 correctly, Mr. Speaker, it is intended simply to throw about the movement of our troops, military and naval, that measure of secrecy which is essential, which always has been essential, and which always will be essential in military and naval strategy.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to inquire of the gentleman just what is the distinction between paragraph (b) of section 2 and section 4?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think section 4 defines specifically and clearly in express terms information which ought not to be published.

Now, so far as the constitutional question is concerned, which my good friend from Ohio [Mr. GARD] argued at some length, it does not seem to me that that is involved. That provision of the Constitution must be interpreted in the light of the conditions that prevailed at the time it was promulgated. That expression "or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press" does not have reference to the publication of facts. It has reference to expressions of opinions through publications. There were no daily papers at the time the Constitution was adopted, and few newspapers of any character. That which the Constitution meant to do was to prevent the suppression of publications such as had been done in various nations of the earth before that time, expressing opinions, not the publication of news. If the interpretation which my good friend from Ohio would place upon that provision is correct, then every libel law that you have upon the statute books is in violation of the Constitution.

Gentlemen of the House, this Nation is engaged in a struggle which I believe is likely to be greater and graver than many of our people have yet even dreamed. Before the war is ended millions of troops will be raised. They will be moved from place to place as military strategy may dictate. Surely we ought to prevent the publication of information whereby the enemy could learn of these movements, and by so learning be enabled to surprise and destroy our troops on land or on sea and defeat our strategy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest affection and respect for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN], whom I regard in every way as a perfect gentleman. But no one on the floor of this House has a right under the ethics of parliamentary law to undertake to discuss private conversations which he has had with other Members of the House, and no one ever safely does it. It has always been one of the sacred thoughts in this House that men on the two sides of the House might have the right to endeavor to get together on propositions, and, if they could not, to fight out the question or the proposition that was submitted. I was surprised beyond measure that the gentleman from Virginia should endeavor to gain sympathy for his proposition, now presented, by stating that men on this side of the House had agreed to compromise with him, and that the compromise had been rejected or withdrawn, no matter which. It is not in accordance with the ethics of this House to refer to such matters. If I should tell on the floor of this House all the things that have been told to me by Members on the other side of the House there would be an exodus from this Chamber on the majority side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not yield. I did not cast any reflection upon the gentleman; only upon what he said. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will credit those who now differ with him with the same high purpose and patriotic intention that they credit him with, and I think that if it be within the conventions of the House I may ask him to bear me out in saying that the tentative proposal submitted to him was submitted at his instance, but Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania and I informed him that we could not support the tentative proposal that was submitted.

Perhaps I bore a larger share than anyone else in suggesting to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we essay in this crisis of the country to come to a common understanding, and I admit that while the language which we had drawn was better than the language which I had submitted 10 days before, upon reflection I could not support his draft any more than mine. I invited the experts of the British commission, civil and military, to consider the terms of our draft, and, indeed, of the later draft submitted to us, and they pronounced both of little or no value. "For you have included," they said, "things of no moment, and omitted that only thing which we consider essential."

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MCCORMICK. I yield for a moment.

Mr. FOCHT. I will ask what these British gentlemen, who were framing up this legislation that would be efficient——

Mr. MCCORMICK. The British gentlemen were not framing up this legislation.

Mr. FOCHT. I understood the gentleman to say so.

Mr. MCCORMICK. No; the gentleman did not understand anything of the kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. What did they suggest?

Mr. MCCORMICK. I will say, Mr. Speaker, when the time comes, apart from the spy bill, if you will sit down to study the problem of the censorship, then I will explain to the House the suggestion of the experts on the British commission.

Now, the difficulty with which we are to deal is that of drawing a censorship section which will meet the exigencies of the case, to find language that will protect without endangering the men enlisted in the Army and the Navy of the United States, because censorship, gentlemen, not merely prohibits publication but it prohibits misrepresentation, conscious or unconscious. A few days ago—I think last Monday—there appeared in some of the newspapers stories of which the titles gave the impression that our fleet was in splendid fighting trim. Now, I think I am not transgressing the bounds of discretion when I say that the fleet is far less ready for action to-day than when it came north from Guantanamo.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, it may be well for the gentleman to give his reasons for that conclusion.

Mr. MCCORMICK. No, sir. While I will touch upon some of the reasons, I do not think it is expedient to give them all now. But information came to me through two individuals, reliable persons and well informed, that, for example, sickness is rife among the recruits. That much has been published, and yet no action was taken until the publication of the facts was made. The sick bays are overflowing, the hospitals are crowded, so that men have been brought here. I am informed that at one point men were herded in sheds. At another point they had no bedding except such as was supplied by private charity. You might go on as regards the secondary batteries, as regards new recruits on the destroyers. You might go on at length. I think it not necessary to do so; but, gentlemen, those of us who now upon reflection are charged with having changed our minds are no less solicitous for the welfare of the enlisted men or for the success of our Army and our Navy than are those who support this section. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, and in the light of what has occurred on the floor within the last few minutes, I may be pardoned for reminding you of the biblical quotation, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." I hope I shall not subject myself to personal criticism because of my opposition to the censorship provision in this bill. The subject matter as contained in the provision comprehends practically everything connected with the Military and Naval Establishments. As stated and shown very clearly by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], no criticism of those in authority which is of such nature as to reveal information concerning these subject matters, would be permissible if this provision should be enacted into law. As you very well know, gentlemen, this Congress has been giving to the administration in the last 60 days power greater than was ever before given a ruling authority in all the history of the world. I have voted for much of it, I am frank to say, with some misgiving. But I want to say to you, not in criticism of the President of the United States but fully cognizant of the frailties of mankind, that I am opposed to granting this tremendous power to any man, and then to permit him the exercise of it in absolute secrecy. [Applause.] I do not believe there is any man in the world good enough or wise enough to have given to him the powers which we have recently given to the administration, and then to even deny the right of criticism as to how he uses those powers. I do not share the fear that there will be any disposition on the part of the press to reveal secrets that would give aid and comfort to the enemy or that would operate to the disadvantage of the United States. Our fleet of destroyers went to Europe the other day. The press knew when they started; they knew of the contemplated journey, and yet we heard of it in America for the first time from the other side of the sea. Instead of the press of the United States giving this information to Germany, Germany gave it to us. Further than that this provision is useless and unnecessary, for if the section be stricken from the bill, I am satisfied that not only under other provisions of the measure but under existing law as well any newspaper publishing information regarding the departure of our troops upon the high seas which would result in the destruction of the transports carrying them, or the loss of the lives of troops, would be subject to prosecution for treason.

The parents of the Nation are entitled to have all reasonable information regarding the sons whom they give to the country. There are to be anxious hearts in America before the year has ended. I do not want to participate in accentuating that anxi-city; rather would I relieve it so far as national interest will permit. I can not therefore support the section which would withhold all information from those who anxiously await tidings as to the welfare of the ones whom they have offered as a priceless sacrifice to the Nation's need. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a few minutes ago, after stating the very high regard he had for me, complained that I had not been ethical in the statement I made. I entertain for the gentleman from Illinois not only a high regard but a very strong affection. The statements which I made were not in violation of any confidence, for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] never made any utterance to me on the subject of any sort or kind. I spoke from the records, from which it appears that he had not filed a minority report, and I had the right to draw the deduction therefore that as a member of the committee he had voted for it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARLIN. I have only one minute.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know as a fact that the report of the committee was made up on the day that I notified the committee that I had to be away, and was filed in the House on that day?

Mr. CARLIN. I will accept the gentleman's statement for that, as I have already done; but I know the gentleman did not file any minority report. I also wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the matter which I read was sent to the conferees of this House, and I did not regard the matter as confidential. It was not given to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. I never spoke to him on the subject. It was brought into the committee and read, and it was never stated, so far as I ever heard, that it was to be considered in any way as confidential, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. We shall have only one more brief speech on this side, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will use the remainder of his time.

Mr. MANN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the constitutional prohibition is against the abridgment of the freedom of the press. The provision contained in this bill is a complete and absolute abridgment of the freedom of the press, touching any matter relating to the movement or activities of our troops. In other words, the language contained in the provision we are asked to vote for would, by clear and definite and logical inference, make unlawful any statement made by any newspaper at any time relating to any matter directly, indirectly, remotely, or collaterally having to do with the prosecution of the war. And this is the spirit of a provision that the gentleman in charge of the bill would have us consider moderate, reasonable, inoccuous, harmless. It would be infinitely more harmful than either the original proposition contained in the bill or the so-called Gard amendment. Under the Gard amendment, unless the President by proclamation prohibited it, it would have been lawful to publish any facts in regard to our troops and military operations in regard to the prosecution of the war. Under the provision now before us it would be unlawful to publish anything relative to any movement of the troops or operation of war or bearing on the same, directly or indirectly, unless specifically authorized by the President to do so. I can think of no language that could be written, no language that could be conjured up, that is more directly in contravention of the prohibition of the Constitution against the abridgment of the freedom of the press than the language contained in the provision before us.

It would make the publication of any fact, however proper, harmless, innocuous, however helpful or useful such publication might be in connection with the progress and development of the war, liable to subject the writer or publisher to imprisonment and trial. Gentlemen may tell us that no one could be convicted unless it was proven that the information given was useful to the enemy. That might possibly be so. But, in any event, the publication of any information relating to anything having to do with the progress of the war, the publication of which had not, in the language of the act, been made lawful by proclamation of the President, would subject, under the provisions of this bill, the person giving that information to the liability of arrest and trial. Under this act our jails might be filled, if the administration was so disposed, with those who in the best of faith published the most ordinary and innocuous facts relative to the progress of the war. [Applause.]

We have and we shall confer upon the President the most extraordinary power. He will during this war be clothed with greater authority than any king or potentate on earth. He will direct the expenditure of greater sums than have ever been expended under a single authority in all time. In view of these facts, how tremendously important is it that the President shall have the protection and the people the assurance that attends the discharge of great responsibility under the white light of the publicity of a free and fearless press.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it seems to me that a large number of gentlemen who have discussed this question have not touched the real language in the section. They have not stated what the section they oppose provides, and at the risk of being tiresome I will read it and draw your attention back to what we are going to vote upon instead of the matters that have been interjected and have nothing to do with it.

When the United States is at war, the publishing willfully of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any of the works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, which information is useful to the enemy, is hereby prohibited.

As I said, I should have been willing to stop right there. I believe that every Member of the House agrees that no newspaper under the guise of "the liberty of the press" should be permitted to willfully publish information concerning the movement of troops which is useful to the enemy.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not. I want the Member to stand up and say that he favors that. Where is the newspaper that will say to-morrow morning that it wants the privilege, under the guise of license of free speech, to publish information useful to the enemy concerning the movements of our dear boys in this war? That is the question. It is not a question of censorship. Mr. Creel's committee has nothing to do with what we are voting on. We want to invoke the sovereign will of this Congress instead of that of a censor.

I want to say, as a man who loves his country above all other countries, that I regret that there was any effort to make a partisan matter of this censorship bill. I do not believe that you ought to be bound, especially the 26 Members who voted for the Gard amendment, ought to be bound by your Republican conference. I say it regretfully that our Republican friends for the first time since the declaration of war have undertaken to make a partisan question of these matters of vital importance to the national defense. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Oh, yes; we know that they wanted to coerce the 26 Republican Members who voted for the Gard amendment.

THE CENSORSHIP QUESTION.

If anybody has a right to object to censorship, it is surely the press and not Congressmen, and yet the opposition to any form of supervision is coming from the latter more than from the former. We have already expressed the decided opinion that the censorship provisions of the espionage bill as originally written were unnecessarily and indefensibly drastic, but as modified later the regulatory power touches no vital right and has been accepted by many newspapers as justified by war conditions. The action of the Republicans in the House is calculated to give a partisan color to a question that has no relation to politics and should be studiously separated from all such influences. If the administration proposed a policy which would gag the press, make criticism of public officials dangerous, or threaten essential freedom of speech, we might all wisely join in denouncing and opposing it. But, in point of fact, it is quite possible to frame a measure that will prevent any curtailment in information which the country ought to possess, or any repression of wholesome editorial comment on official acts, and yet permit the suppression of news that would help the enemy.

The really weak point in the administration program is the proposal to make Cabinet or other regular Government officials members of the board of censors. A great deal of the opposition to censorship arises from the conviction that such a proposal is wrong in principle and would be likely to work badly in practice. No man ought to be a judge in his own case, and few men are strong enough and fair enough to decide against themselves. The members of the President's official household will unquestionably make mistakes, more or less serious, before the war is over, and they naturally will be inclined to shield themselves as much as possible. It is quite as important to the national welfare that saving criticism should not be throttled as that information should not be given to the enemy. Great Britain owes its salvation to-day far more to an independent press than to the wisdom of the public officials under whom the war was inaugurated. Our censorship board should be composed exclusively of representative newspaper men of experience and national standing, entirely free from the dictation of officials who may be affected by the course of events.

Under such auspices and under the conditions provided in the House bill the country will not suffer either from lack of freedom of speech or from the suppression of legitimate information. Censorship is not directed, indeed, against any genuine American or loyal American newspaper. They do not need it, and they have shown in the last few weeks that they require no directing hand from Washington or anywhere else to induce them to observe what the President calls "a patriotic reticence." But it must not be forgotten that "there are some persons in a position to do mischief in this field who can not be relied upon, and whose interests or desires will lead to actions on their part highly dangerous to the Nation in the midst of a war." It is against these that it is necessary to guard, and we believe it is imperative that the Government should be given power to deal with them firmly and promptly. But we believe also that the opposition to any and all censorship would be lessened greatly if the President would make it known that the board would be composed, as we have suggested above, of broad-minded newspaper men, perfectly able to comprehend the point of view of Army and Navy officials, and yet having full power of final decision.

Now, the Gard amendment, I submit, is a hundred times more drastic and more objectionable from the standpoint of gentlemen who oppose this amendment than the one presented now, because the Gard amendment provides that the President may prohibit the publishing willfully and without proper authority of any information relating to national defense.

Now listen:

And the President is hereby authorized to declare by proclamation the existence of such national emergency, and is authorized from time to time by proclamation to declare the character of such information which is or may be useful to the enemy.

And then the term "national defense" is defined as including any person, place, or thing in anywise having to do with the preparation for or the consideration or execution of any military or naval plans, expeditions, orders, supplies, or warfare for the advantage, defense, or security of the United States.

What can be broader than that? There was objection in some quarters to the Gard amendment, but we have restricted it so that any man can understand what he is voting for, and I do not believe that there is a man in this House that will want to tell his constituency that he released the newspapers so that they are now outside of all censorship. The Gard amendment was much more drastic than this provision that we present here. Surely no Member wants any newspapers to be given the privilege of willfully publishing any information useful to the enemy concerning the military operations of our own troops.

Tell me why we should not pass such a law as this? My friend from Chicago, Mr. MCCORMICK, when the bill was before the House, offered what he called a mild amendment, and voted for it, and I submit again that it is fifty times more drastic than the provision we present to you in the conference report, and here it is. He offered it and voted for it, and I presume other Republicans voted for it. His amendment was:

Page 36, section 4, strike out all of line 7 and all of line 8 up to and including the words "to the enemy," and substitute the following: "Movement, numbers, description, or disposition"—

That is the very language used in our section. It is practically the Cummins amendment, offered in the Senate, that is used here. We have not put in anything about the condition or the equipment of the troops, but it is something that is in action—the number, movement, description, or disposition. That is the language of Mr. MCCORMICK'S amendment also:

Movement, numbers, description, or disposition of any armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials—

He did not want you to discuss war materials. That is the amendment that he offered here and voted for, and now he balks and gags at the simple amendment which the conference committee has presented to the House.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Not now, not until I get through reading this amendment—or with respect to the plans for the conduct of any naval or military operations—

He would not let you discuss the plans or the conduct of any supposed military operations. That is the amendment that he voted for on the floor of this House, and numbers of you gentlemen voted with him, and I submit that he is straining now at a gnat when he swallowed a camel two weeks ago, because his amendment which he asked you to vote for is far more drastic than the amendment we present to you now. He does not stop there—or with respect to the plans for the conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place prior to the publication or communication of such facts by the Government directly or by his authority.

It turns out that practically all of our friends have voted heretofore for more drastic provisions than we present to you here. We ask you to say by your solemn enactment at a time like this that it shall be unlawful for any man to willfully publish the number, movement, disposition, or description of the armed forces of our country in a naval or military operation, if that information is useful to the enemy.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. And all we do now, instead of giving the President the power to enlarge, is to say that certain information about the movement of our troops in naval or military operations, which information is useful to the enemy, shall not be published.

The President thinks something along this line is imperative for the safety and success of our Army and Navy, and hence for the success of our Nation. Here is what he writes me:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 22, 1917.

Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WEBB: I have been very much surprised to find several of the public prints stating that the administration had abandoned the position which it so distinctly took, and still holds, that authority to exercise censorship over the press to the extent that that censorship is embodied in the recent action of the House of Representatives is absolutely necessary to the public safety. It of course, has not been abandoned, because the reasons still exist why such authority is necessary for the protection of the Nation.

I have every confidence that the great majority of the newspapers of the country will observe a patriotic reticence about everything whose publication could be of injury, but in every country there are some persons in a position to do mischief in this field who can not be relied upon, and whose interests or desires will lead to actions on their part highly dangerous to the Nation in the midst of a war. I want to say again that it seems to me imperative that powers of this sort should be granted.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion to recommit was agreed to was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman, under the circumstances, that he ask unanimous consent for all Members to extend their remarks on this matter.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who spoke on this matter——

Mr. MANN. No; all Members; the time was very limited.

Mr. WEBB. Well, Mr. Speaker, all Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY], Mr. HAYES, Mr. KINKAID, Mr. FOCHT, Mr. LANGLEY, Mr. JUUL, Mr. SIEGEL, Mr. LAGUARDIA—all ask to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas objects.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield? There was very little debate on this subject, owing to the situation in the session. On every other subject of this kind we have given general leave of this kind. Does not the gentleman think we ought to give it in this case? I think nearly everybody on our side has already obtained leave.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kansas stick to his objection?

Mr. HELVERING. Is not this the same bill we have discussed before?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HELVERING. Was not time given for everybody to discuss it who wished to do so?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not at all. There were many gentlemen who did not have a chance.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his objection?

Mr. HELVERING. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I object, Mr. Speaker, and I will stick to it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia gets the indulgence of the House very often.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to any more——

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. VINSON. Does the gentleman object to my request?

Mr. HOWARD. I shall have to be obliged to treat my beloved colleague in the same manner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject. I only had three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the request.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not hear the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois addressed the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask leave to extend my little three minutes on the subject of this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WAR INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not object to anything or anybody.

The SPEAKER. Why does the gentleman rise, then? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, has an order making that bill privileged, and it would be in order, but he is willing on account of the urgency of the case that I should be recognized to ask consideration of the bill S. 2133, to amend the war insurance bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the war insurance bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to take it up in the morning, so that Members have notice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this the war-risk bill? If so, I object. This is raising the amount of $50,000,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. You can move to amend it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I object to it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I ask that it be given a privileged status.

Mr. MANN. Fix a time for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be made privileged. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. ADAMSON. Just as these other bills were made privileged—subject to conference reports and appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Nobody knows when it will come up.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am willing to have it come up to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. I am willing to make the arrangements and not have it float around here and nobody know when it will come up.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say that the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is willing to have it come next.

Mr. HEFLIN. How long will it take to pass it?

Mr. ADAMSON. It ought not to take more than a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the bill which he undertook to call up shall be made privileged for to-morrow, of course conference reports having the right of way. Is there objection to that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, this passes it over until to-morrow morning so that we can have a chance to see the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall not object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RETIRED ENGINEER OFFICERS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 70, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. SMALL. It is in regard to retired officers in the Corps of Engineers. I ask that it be reported, pending the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 70, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 70, relating to the service of certain retired officers of the Army.

Resolved, etc., That when retired officers of the Army, any portion of whose active service was in the Corps of Engineers, are called back into active service they shall be eligible to fill any position required by law to be filled by an officer of the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, the urgency of this legislation is this: When officers of the Engineer Corps are retired they are not retired as Engineers, but as officers of the Army. During this period of war it has been necessary to utilize Engineer officers who have been heretofore detailed for river and harbor work. For instance, Col. Townsend, at the head of the Mississippi River Commission, has been relieved of that detail and placed in command of a regiment. We have a number of able officers retired from the Engineer Corps who are willing and who can be compelled to serve, but a good many of the positions to which it is desired to assign them under the law require Engineer officers. And this simply gives a retired Engineer officer when he is put into active duty the status of an officer of the Corps of Engineers as formerly, and only during the continuance of such active duty.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that does not belong to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, although I feel very much interested in it.

Mr. SMALL. I concede that.

Mr. MANN. But whatever may be the facts in the case—and I am sure I do not know the merits of the proposition—it ought to be reported from the Military Committee of the House. Therefore I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. VAN DYKE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Emelia McNicol (H. R. 9308, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I would respectfully ask for leave of absence for Thursday and Friday, to attend the funeral of the late ambassador to Japan, the Hon. George W. Guthrie.

Yours, very truly, BRUCE F. STERLING,
Twenty-third Pennsylvania District.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMALL. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER] is in the Hall——

Mr. MANN. You can not agree upon any time to-night, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. If we can not agree upon time this evening, Mr. Speaker, we will do that at a later time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the river and harbor bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SMALL. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 61.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees——

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, June 1, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 1, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we unite our hearts in fervent prayer to Thee. We bless Thee that in these times when there is so much uncertainty and unrest we are assured that there is a realm where truth abides in eternal fullness and that there are self-manifesting truths in this world which are eternal and changeless. We pray Thee to shine the light of Thy truth upon all the policies adopted in the Senate and all the laws which are passed for the government of the Nation. We pray that we may so act in the performance of the solemn duties of this place as that all may have the approval of the great God whose we are and whom we serve. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives recommitting to the conferees the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and to better enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate conferees be permitted to withdraw the report they submitted upon the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the conference report is withdrawn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HUSTING. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact a law vesting power in an appointive commission to regulate and control the production, distribution, transportation, and price of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities.

Whereas control of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities is essential to the welfare of our country and people and the prompt enactment of appropriate legislation to accomplish this end is necessary for success in the present war and for the safety and preservation of our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact at once a thoroughgoing law that will vest in a commission to be appointed by the President appropriate power to regulate and control the production, distribution, transportation, and price of foodstuffs, grains, fuel, and other basic commodities; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the chief clerk of the senate to the President of the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and also to the Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States.

EDWARD F. DITTEMAR,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
LAWRENCE C. WHITTET,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. HUSTING. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the economical and conserving use of food supplies.

Whereas in the present world crisis the economical and conserving use of food supplies is a highly patriotic and broadly humanitarian duty; and

Whereas the present standard of milling wheat into white flour diverts more than a quarter of the wheat from use as human food; and

Whereas the adoption of a high standard for milling wheat would be equal to increasing the supply of wheat by nearly 100,000,000 bushels: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature does urge upon the Congress of the United States that it take such action as may be necessary to conserve the supply of wheat by requiring a high milling standard.

That copies of this resolution, duly attested by the presiding officers and chief clerks of the assembly and senate, be transmitted to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Wisconsin.

LAWRENCE C. WHITTET,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Bank of Commerce & Trust Co. subscribed for $1,000,000 of liberty bonds.

F. O. VINTON, President.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is one of the largest, and I am informed is the largest, purchase of these bonds by any individual or corporation south of the Ohio River. I take great pleasure in congratulating the institution in my home city upon this splendid manifestation of its patriotism, and hope its example will be followed in the same liberal spirit by banks all over the country.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the pupils of the seventh grade, Allen School, of Rochester, N. H., remonstrating against any increase in second-class postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Strafford County Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Farmington; of the Woman's Christian Temperance union of Henniker; of Morning Star Grange, No. 62, Patrons of Husbandry, of Lyme; of 15 members of the Congregational Christian Endeavor Society of Penacook; of 30 members of the Curtis Memorial Christian Endeavor Society, of Concord; of 36 members of the South Congregational Christian Endeavor Society of Concord; of 27 members of the North Congregational Christian Endeavor Society of Concord; of 15 members of the Congregational Christian Endeavor Society of East Concord; of 45 members of the Congregational Christian Endeavor Society and of 9 members of the Boy Scouts of America, of Pembroke; of 16 members of the Pleasant Street Baptist Christian Endeavor Society, of Concord; and of 44 members of the First Baptist Christian Endeavor Society of Penacook, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BECKHAM. I present petitions of citizens of Kentucky, praying for national prohibition, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIR: The inclosed petition has been sent to us with the request that we forward it to you to be presented to the Senate for record.

Respectfully,

BOARD OF TEMPERANCE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned earnestly petition for the immediate enactment of prohibition of the manufacture of alcoholic liquors as a measure of food conservation and for the immediate prohibition of the sale of liquors for beverage purposes in order to conserve the health, wealth, labor, transport facilities, and military efficiency of the people.

J. M. LITERAL
(And others).

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We appeal to you for legislation prohibiting the consumption of food products in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Care of Senator J. C. W. Beckham, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned members of the Twenty-second and Walnut Street Baptist Church, of Louisville, Ky., hereby petition your honorable body not to tax but prohibit the liquor business as a war measure

C. A. JENSON
(And others).

Mr. HOLLIS. I present a petition of the Anti-Saloon League, Department of New Hampshire, of Concord, N. H., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
DEPARTMENT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
CONCORD, N. H., May 29, 1917.

To the SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.:

The Anti-Saloon League of New Hampshire, in annual meeting assembled, earnestly petitions your honorable body: (1) To pass as soon as possible the resolution submitting to the several States for their legislative consideration a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes.

(2) To enact all possible national legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor during the period of the war, to the end that: (a) Food products be saved from the waste involved in its manufacture into intoxicating liquor; and (b) to stop the enormous waste of man power employed in the manufacture and distribution of such liquor; and (c) to prevent the loss of manhood, in efficiency and honor, which so terribly results from the use of intoxicating liquor.

The State of New Hampshire has recently enacted a law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor for beverage use. We, therefore, are consistent in petitioning for and demanding prohibitory legislation of the National Congress.

We are giving our sons in sacrifice to protect essential and eternal rights and liberties for all peoples. We have the essential right to demand of the Government, in accepting these sons for such noble service, that they shall be protected as far as possible from preventable evils. The evils of the liquor traffic to masses of men assembled in great concentration training camps are enormous; but they are in a large measure preventable by proper prohibitory restrictions.

To fail in any measure to provide the fullest possible protection from these evils will be criminal neglect for which there can be no reason or excuse.

Therefore, for temporary war-measure prohibition and for permanent national prohibition by the submission of constitutional amendment, we humbly and earnestly pray.

J. S. LEWIS, President.
R. H. HUSE, Secretary.
J. H. ROBBINS, Superintendent.

Mr. PHELAN presented petitions of Local Union No. 78, Printing Pressmen's Union, of Los Angeles, and of the Marin County Building Trades Council, of San Rafael, in the State of California, praying that the war expenses be met by increased income taxes, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a petition of the Rutherford (N. J.) Republican Club, praying that the payment of the war debt be extended over a number of years, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Hat Finishers Local Union No. 14, of Newark, N. J., praying for Government control of foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the State Organization for Public Health Nursing, of Long Branch, N. J., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Newark, Trenton, Atlantic City, Allenwood, Perth Amboy, Paterson, and Hoboken, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the prohibition of the manufacture of beer and light wine, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRADY. I present a resolution passed by Lewiston Commercial Club, of Idaho, calling attention to the fact that the committee on transportation of the Council of National Defense is composed entirely of railroad men, and suggesting that a committee of men particularly acquainted with waterways transportation be appointed to develop the inland waterways and cooperate with the rail committee and coordinate the work. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Lake Geneva, Cambria, Superior, Portage, Rewey, Madison, Weyauwega, Spring Valley, Boyceville, Belleville, Berlin, Gillett, Tomah, Larmartine, Merrimac, Durand, Minocqua, Oconomowoc, Elkhorn, and Maiden Rock, all in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into alcoholic liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the prohibition of the manufacture of foodstuffs into alcoholic liquor, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Fair Haven, Vt., remonstrating against the so-called excess profits law, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce without amendment, be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I feel obliged to object to the present consideration of this bill. The bill is a very important one, and it is one that should be carefully considered when it is taken up.

If I understand the language of the bill correctly, it makes it a criminal offense for any body of men engaged in interstate-commerce transportation to strike. I do not believe that is the deliberate intention of the Senator from Nevada, because the Interstate Commerce Committee, I understand, has refused or, at least, has failed to report favorably a bill which would enforce upon railroad employees compulsory arbitration. If the Committee on Interstate Commerce is not willing to report favorably a bill to enforce compulsory arbitration on railroad employees, it certainly does not intend to report a bill which will make it a criminal offense to conduct the ordinary railroad strike.

I was consulted about this bill last Tuesday by the heads of the railroad brotherhood. At that time they did not know, and I did not know, that the bill had been favorably reported and was upon the calendar. I have telegraphed to the head of one of the railroad brotherhoods telling him that the bill has been favorably reported and that it is upon the calendar, and that the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee declines to have it amended so as to permit ordinary peaceful strikes.

I feel that the bill ought not to be considered on such short notice, and if it is considered I shall feel obliged to resist it and to argue the matter out so that the Senate may fully understand it. I therefore oppose the motion to take it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say with reference to the bill, the consideration of which I urge, that the committee concluded not to enter upon any phase of strike legislation at this session, and that the bill is not intended to prevent strikes, nor will it have that effect. It is simply an extension in the first section of the legislation which is now on the statute book regarding the mails and extends that legislation to trains operating in interstate commerce. It simply prevents the attempt by physical force, threats, or intimidation, to obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movements in the United States of trains in interstate commerce.

The bill was very carefully considered by the committee. It is their opinion, and it is my opinion, that it will have no effect upon strikes. It has no relation to strikes and is not intended to interfere in any degree with the power of strikes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. In looking at the bill a day or two ago, I discovered that it only applied to the period covered by the war with Germany.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It applies only to the period covered by the war with Germany; that is all. Now, I ask the junior Senator from New Hampshire what amendment is it he wishes to offer?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have not yet stated to the Senate that I desire to offer an amendment to the bill; but I have stated that I do not want the matter considered at this time, until the brotherhoods, who are vitally interested in the legislation, have time to understand what the situation is and to prepare to meet it, if they can.

I will say, however, to the Senate, as I said to the chairman of the committee, that I believe the bill is framed to prevent the use of physical force to obstruct interstate commerce. If the Senator desires to prevent the use of physical force to obstruct interstate commerce, that can very easily be done by introducing, after the word "threats," in line 5, on page 1, the words "or physical force," and after the word "intimidation," in the same line, the words "through physical force." I believe that is what the committee intended, but that is what the committee does not say.

If a body of railroad men should threaten that they would inaugurate a peaceful strike, they would be liable to punishment criminally under the terms of the bill. If the Senator does not intend that, there is no reason at all why he should not consent to the insertion of the words "or physical force" and the words "through physical force" in the places I have indicated. I have privately asked the Senator to do that, but he says he can not, and must submit the matter to a vote of the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have my instructions, of course, from the committee to report this bill, and can not, without their consent, accept the amendment. I will say, however, that there is no intention at all in this bill of affecting the power of strike or of making a strike itself a criminal offense.

Now, may I ask the junior Senator from New Hampshire if the amendments which he suggests are accepted, will he waive his objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall object to the present consideration of this bill. It is entirely too important to be taken up in this way. I have not had an opportunity to read it; but I have read the opening paragraph, and I notice that it contains subject-matter which was before the Committee on the Judiciary, and which, as I think, is in part embraced in what is commonly known as the espionage bill, being one of the chapters of that bill that has nothing to do with espionage. I want to take time to examine the bill. It opens up a big field.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I can see that I can not get the present consideration of this bill, but I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that it is exceedingly important to get soon upon the statute books the legislation contained in the second section of this bill, authorizing priorities in traffic to meet the emergencies of war. It has been urgently called for by the President in a communication addressed to the chairman of the committee. The subject has been very carefully considered, first, by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the other House and the leading minority member of that committee in conjunction with the chairman of the committee of the Senate and the leading minority member of that committee. We agreed upon a bill, and that bill was introduced in both Houses. It was afterwards considered by the Senate committee and referred to a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and myself. We carefully considered it and reported a substitute to the full committee. The substitute, as a new and independent bill, has been reported by the committee, as I recollect, without a dissent; it is part of the urgent emergency legislation called for by the President, and I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in its consideration. I of course yield to pressure now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I merely want to say a word.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the value of the rule that on an objection a bill may not be considered if it is going to be considered?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the reports of committees.

REPORT ON LOWER COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask that a report recommended by the Secretary of the Interior on the Colorado River prepared by C. E. Grunsky, consulting engineer, be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
FREDK. H. GILLETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments, agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, on yesterday evening at the time we adjourned, I had just offered an amendment. I should like now to withdraw that amendment and to substitute in place of it the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. The amendment which I have offered is an amendment to the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] dealing with the stimulation of the production of fish and the marketing of fish. The amendment which I now offer changes the amendment of the Senator from Florida in this particular. It eliminates the provision which permitted the Government to engage in the fishing business. Instead of engaging in the fishing business, it allows the Government to purchase the fish; instead of having the fund go back into the Treasury, it provides that this fund shall be a revolving fund, and may be used continuously for the purpose of developing this industry.

I consider this amendment a very important one. I think that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] yesterday, by the remark he made, had come to the conclusion that I was opposed to the principle of this amendment by reason of the question that I asked him concerning the Perkins committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nevada ought to be read for the information of the Senate; but pending that I will ask the Senator from Nevada what the Government is going to do with the fish after the Government purchases them?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will discuss that subject very briefly in a few moments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, for the present, I will ask that the amendment be read, so that we may better understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before that is done I want to say that I do not see that it takes the Government out of the fishing business by allowing the Government to purchase the fish, if the Government in turn sells the fish, which I should think it would have to do. However, we shall hear the amendment read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct such operations in the United States, including Alaska, as may be necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods employed in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods; and to increase the consumption thereof; and to purchase, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals; and to do any and all things necessary and convenient for carrying out the purposes of this act.

That for the said purposes the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hire, charter, rent, or purchase buildings and lands, vessels, and fishing gear, and any and all equipment necessary or convenient for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; to employ all persons necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; to purchase, either in the open market or in competitive bids, such supplies as may be necessary; and to buy and sell fishes and other aquatic food animals, either fresh or cured: Provided, That the proceeds of any sales may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

That for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this act, including the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office, there shall be appropriated a sum not to exceed $250,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as I was saying, if the Senator from Iowa gained the idea that I was opposed to this legislation he was mistaken. I think the results of the Perkins committee caused legislation of this character to be suggested. There is no question that that committee was successful in purchasing smelt and distributing those smelt in New York City at one-third of the ordinary price without any loss to the committee. The reason of their success was not because the committee engaged in the fishing occupation; they did not engage in catching smelt. But they found this condition to exist: There was an abundance of smelt throughout the waters of this country; that there were numerous fishermen who would catch those smelt if there was a market provided for the fish, but there was no market provided. The facilities for refrigerating fish and transporting them to market were not in existence, but when this committee supplied those deficiencies of the trade, then there was an ample supply of fish caught and furnished to the market at one-third of the ordinary price. You will find on the Pacific coast this exact condition now.

They have salmon canneries on the Pacific coast; but those canneries do not want halibut, nor do they want smelt, nor do they want cod. Consequently when the fisherman goes to one of those great canneries with anything except salmon, such fish must be thrown away and constitute a waste. It is for the purpose of taking up that waste that this amendment is introduced.

The reason that the fish supply on the Pacific coast is not increasing is because there is no way to dispose of the fish. The only purchasers of fish on the Pacific coast are the canneries and packing houses, and the only canneries and packing houses are those using salmon and halibut. The halibut industry has not been developed to any extent, and yet on that coast there is one of the greatest fields for the production of halibut food in the world. It has proven a success. They are bringing halibut to-day from Alaskan waters to the city of Boston and selling it there at a profit.

I would not consider this subject for a moment except as a war emergency measure. If this food is not needed immediately, then there is no excuse for this provision at all, because in the course of time private enterprise will enter the field, and when private enterprise does enter that field it is going to develop those resources and probably will supply this foodstuff as cheaply as the Government would supply it; but at the present time the people of this country need this fish food, and it can only be supplied to them through the medium of the United States Government. I believe it is needed; I do not think any Senator here will deny that it is needed; and, if it is needed, we must get it. If there is any other means which may be suggested whereby private enterprise could supply these fish to the public, then I would be for that; but I do not believe that is possible.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. HUSTING. Suppose that the bill passes as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Nevada and that private enterprise will not go into the fishing business in Alaskan waters, what then?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, private enterprise will go wherever there is a market for their product. It is useless to ask a question with the premise, "Suppose a man does not desire to do business" or "suppose a man does not desire to make a profit." If the Government goes out there and enters upon the fishing business it will have to hire the very fishermen who would be willing to fish on their own account. If Mr. Redfield should go out and buy a lot of seine and start catching fish in Alaskan waters I do not assume that he would take anyone out there from his office to perform that particular labor. He would be likely to get the fishermen who understand this business; and if it was worth hiring fishermen to catch the fish, the fishermen themselves would catch the fish without being hired.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. Can not the Senator conceive of a situation where it might not be an attractive business, that there might not be any great amount of profit in it, and at the same time enable those engaged in it to sell the product cheaply, whereas the Government, not desiring to make any profit, but merely desiring to add to the food supply, would approach it from an entirely different angle and standpoint than would private enterprise?

Mr. PITTMAN. I can, of course, conceive of that condition existing, but I can not conceive of that condition existing under the facts. As a matter of fact, the waters of the Pacific Ocean, particularly those of Alaska, are full of fish, and fishermen there can catch a larger quantity of fish in a given time than in any other waters surrounding our country. It is not a question of catching the fish, it is a question of marketing the fish. That is the great defect. I have been so informed by those who have charge of matters of this kind in Alaskan waters. I desire to state that I discussed this question with Mr. Jones, of the Revenue Service, only yesterday, and he confirmed exactly what my private opinion was on the subject, namely, that it is not a question of catching the fish or of not catching a sufficient quantity of fish, but the problem is what to do with them after they are caught.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Nevada refers, I presume, to Dr. Jones, who was formerly the head of the Fisheries Bureau of the Government?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; he is the gentleman to whom I refer—Dr. Jones.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He is thoroughly acquainted with the fishing industry on the Alaskan coast.

Mr. PITTMAN. He is absolutely familiar with it; and the facts he presented gave me the view of the subject that I am now presenting. He said that there were hundreds of fishermen there ready to engage in the enterprise; that the waters were teeming with fish; but that men could not be induced to fish now because there was no market for the catch.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. I dislike to disturb the Senator——

Mr. PITTMAN. It is no disturbance.

Mr. HUSTING. But is there any market that is available to the United States Government that is not available to the private fisherman?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know that there is, and yet private fishermen can not create a market, while I hope that the Government may be able to create a market. For instance, there was no market for the smelt of the Pacific Ocean, but the Perkins committee made a market for it. How did they make that market? They got cars to the places where they wanted to load the fish; they carried the fish to the market in New York and provided for the distribution of the fish at that point. That is the way it was done.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to suggest to the Senator that what Mr. Perkins and his associates said was that it was to furnish the facilities to get them to the market rather than to create the market itself. The market, I want to suggest to the Senator, appears to be here. The people want food, and they have not got it. There is a demand for food. Consequently the market is here. The market is here with our allies.

I should like to ask the Senator whether this is not really the situation: The fishermen fear that this demand or market will be only temporary—that is to say, during the war emergency—and they do not want to embark on this enterprise temporarily and mobilize the facilities for serving this temporary market, which would not be an attractive business proposition; and is not that also a good reason why the United States should go into this business and take care of this emergency? It is only an emergency.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a market here, but there is not a market at the present time available to the men who fish. Of course, there is a market everywhere for foodstuffs, but what I mean by a market is an available market to the fisherman. The fisherman to-day can catch thousands of pounds of smelt in Alaskan waters, and he can not do anything with them. He would have to dump them out on the beach. It would be impossible to handle them. It would be necessary, in the first place, to have some refrigerating opportunity. You would have to have transportation to the market. Now, we know that the ordinary fisherman can not accomplish that. The Perkins committee did accomplish it. The United States Government may be able to accomplish what the Perkins committee accomplished. I hope so.

Then let me tell you another great source of loss there. There are tremendous pound nets in the waters of the Pacific Ocean. Into those pound nets go thousands upon thousands of salmon, and with those salmon go other fish. The canneries want only the salmon. Consequently the great catch of other fish is an entire waste. They are thrown out and wasted. Why? Because the canneries want salmon, and there is nobody to purchase the other fish.

Now, if the Secretary of Commerce had a purchasing agent there, all of these other kinds of fish, which, while probably inferior to salmon, are good foodstuff, would be accumulated by the Department of Commerce. They would have to have some refrigerating capacity at the point where they accumulated them, to keep them until they had an opportunity to ship them across the continent.

That is the situation. If this is an emergency, if it is essential to increase the food supply immediately, then this is the only way in which you can immediately do it. It is unnecessary to authorize the Government to engage in the fishing business, because it would have to engage the very same fishermen who are ready to fish to-day, if you will buy the fish.

The Senator from Wisconsin says that possibly these fishermen would not go out and catch the fish for fear there would not be a permanent market. Why, there is no great outfit to the ordinary fisherman's paraphernalia. He has his seines already if he is a fisherman. He has the outfit already. As poor as the market is, it is his only means of making a living. Consequently, when the Government comes to him and says: "We will purchase from you all kinds of fish that are fit to eat," then he will not throw them out of his nets when he is catching salmon, he will not throw them out of his nets when he is catching halibut, but he will bring them to the depository of the United States Government, where they can be sold, and the Government can distribute them through the country where they are needed.

I should object very much to seeing the Government engaged in the fishing business for three reasons: Because there are ample men engaged in that business to-day, because it is unnecessary to the production of this foodstuff, because it is not an emergency. For those reasons I should feel compelled to vote against this measure if instead of stimulating fishermen to continue in business it takes the business away from the fishermen.

Now, there is one other provision. I have amended it so as to provide that instead of this $250,000 going back into the Treasury, it shall be retained as a revolving fund. In other words, if they buy $250,000 worth of fish and sell them to the people of this country, I want them to use those proceeds to buy more fish and transport them to the people of the country so long as this war emergency exists. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have refrained from discussing the provisions of this bill because I thought it was presented here as a war emergency measure, and I did not desire to take the time of the Senate to delay the passage of this bill. I have been almost forced to the conclusion that it is not being urged as a war measure, and that we are not very anxious to get it through. All sorts of propositions apparently are being proposed by way of additions to the bill, and its consideration is apparently being indefinitely prolonged.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator, if I may, whether he means that the committee is not making a serious effort to get the bill through. If so, I should like to have him please suggest what more the committee can do. There is no way of stopping the introduction of these amendments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, I think if this is a war measure we ought not to have been adjourning from day to day, taking hours for the consideration of other matters in the morning hour, but we should have been pushing it at all times of the day. I have not seen very much insistence upon getting a vote upon the bill, except upon the part of the Senator from Iowa. I will do him the credit to say that he has made some special efforts, but otherwise I have not seen any special effort to secure the passage of this bill.

Now, Mr. President, I am only going to take a few minutes. I do not treat this proposition lightly, as some have intimated that some Senators are doing, but I do think it would be very unwise to adopt the amendment in the form proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], without more careful consideration than can be given it in this fashion without investigation by a committee.

I want to call attention to the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce. In the first place, this proposition is not presented as a war measure. It is not presented as an emergency measure. It is not presented as a bill to meet an emergency situation, and it is not urged on that ground by the Secretary of Commerce.

Reference has been made to the action of the Fisheries Committee. I am a member of the Fisheries Committee of the Senate. I did not know of one meeting that was called to consider this measure until after it had been held or I probably would have been there, although I remember that I had another meeting of a special committee at that time. The committee was being polled for a favorable report upon the bill, and it was presented to me. Four or five members of the committee had signed, authorizing a favorable report. I looked over the bill and objected to its being reported, and refused to sign, and spoke to one or two of the other Senators who had signed to report it on a poll of the committee, and they said that they did not know that the bill contained what it did, and that they were not in favor of it. Then, I understand, immediately the committee was called to consider the bill further. It was impossible for me to be present at that meeting, and, as I understand, no action was taken by the Fisheries Committee.

So much for that. Now, what about the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce? It is significant in its language. It was read into the RECORD yesterday, and the Senate had a right to consider that the Secretary of Commerce was in favor of this bill; but I want to read what he says about it as it appears in the RECORD:

> The two essential features of the bill are (1) that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to develop new aquatic sources of food and to bring about the fuller utilization of sources not now adequately utilized.

Now, that is the first purpose of the bill. What does the Secretary say about that? He says:

> In respect to the first-named feature of the bill, I wish to make a very hearty indorsement.

Then he goes on to set out some further reasons for it. I want to say that I am heartily in favor of action along that line, not as a war measure, not as an emergency measure, but as a permanent policy of the Government, as long as it may be necessary to do what is specified there, and that is the only basis upon which the Secretary of Commerce urges it. I would be glad to support a well-considered proposition carrying out that idea.

Without taking the time to read further about that, what is the second purpose of the bill? The second purpose is this:

> That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to engage in the business of catching, curing, transporting, and marketing such fishes and other aquatic food products.

What does the Secretary say about that proposition and the attitude of his department? He does not say that he is heartily in favor of that. He does not say that he enthusiastically urges that proposition, but he says this:

> A noteworthy departure in governmental activities is contemplated by that feature of the bill which provides that the Government itself shall engage in commercial fishing operations.

Then he goes on to express what is evidently to him the intention or desire of the Fisheries Committee of the Senate, and refers to a meeting and a hearing of the committee, at which, apparently, he got the impression that the committee wanted something of this sort done. Now, what does he say?

> The department is glad to undertake this work and believes that it can carry it on successfully without interfering with private enterprise. Certainly it will make every effort to that end.

Of course, the department is glad to have its activities extended and the field of its operations widened. You never saw a department of the Government yet that was not in favor of extending its operations just as much as possible, and of course they will try to carry out these propositions just as well as possible; but I do not construe that language as a very enthusiastic indorsement of that proposition by the Department of Commerce.

He says, of course, in conclusion, that he recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, that expresses as nearly as the report does the attitude of the department. The department is heartily in favor of the two propositions in the bill to utilize new sources of aquatic food and to develop those that are not thoroughly developed, and with that I think almost everybody could agree.

We had a bill something along these lines in the last Congress. A bill was introduced in the last Congress by Senator Johnson, of Maine, which provided as follows:

> That the Commissioner of Fisheries be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct investigations and experiments for the purpose of ameliorating the damage wrought to the fisheries by dogfish and other predaceous fishes and aquatic animals.

Now, they had a provision in that bill that read as follows:

> That the said investigations and experiments shall be such as to develop the best and cheapest means of taking such fishes and aquatic animals, of utilizing them for economic purposes, especially for food, and to establish fisheries and markets for them; and for these purposes the Commissioner of Fisheries is authorized to employ such persons as may be necessary, and to catch, buy, or otherwise obtain, and to sell at cost or less, or distribute gratuitously, such quantities of the said aquatic products as may be necessary for tests or demonstrations of their qualities or the establishment of a demand among prospective customers: Provided, That the proceeds of any such sales shall be accounted for and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The committee had hearings with reference to this bill. They had the representatives of the Department of Commerce there, and the committee was impressed with the importance of developing some way by which these predaceous fishes could be utilized in a beneficial sort of a way; but the committee was not in favor of authorizing the department to go into the market and buy fish and sell them, and so the committee changed this language. As it was in the original bill it read:

> And to establish fisheries and markets for them.

The committee amended that to read:

> And to encourage the establishment of fisheries and markets for them.

Then it struck out all the language of the bill reading as as follows:

> And for these purposes the Commissioner of Fisheries is authorized to employ such persons as may be necessary, and to catch, buy, or otherwise obtain, and to sell at cost or less, or distribute gratuitously—

And so forth.

It cut out all that part of the bill, and the bill as amended became a law, and we appropriated $25,000 for this activity on the part of the Department of Commerce, and I suppose that the department is at work along that line now. What they have accomplished I do not know. It seems to me we ought to know something of what they have done, and we ought to know something about the lack of utilization of the present food-fish supply, to see along what particular lines they are going to exercise their activities. But, without delaying for that purpose, I would not seriously object to a provision along the line of that suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], although I am inclined to think that a measure of this sort ought to have the careful consideration of the committee, and it ought not to be presented here as an amendment to a war-emergency bill. The Senator from Nevada says that he wants it confined to the period of the war. I do not know whether his amendment limits it to that or not. I do not think it does.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment of the Senator from Florida does not limit it to the war. It is a permanent statute and a permanent policy.

Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. GORE, and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield first to the Senator from Nevada. Possibly he wants to throw some light o this matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. I agree with the Senator, although I thought the general amendment did limit it to the war. I am satisfied that it should be limited to the period of the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if inserted before the last section, and without any exception made in that section, then by the terms of the last section it would be limited to the period of the war.

Mr. FLETCHER. The general provision of the bill is limited to the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know but that section 8 is made a permanent policy.

Mr. FLETCHER. Section 8 is the only exception.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would be limited, then, to the period of the war, and that would make it practically unavailing.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is one of the Senators who is quite familiar with Alaskan conditions. I will ask the Senator whether he can inform us to what extent the halibut industry is being developed in Alaska? In this connection I will suggest that some 15 or 16 years ago I saw a halibut which weighed 80 pounds hooked by a lady from San Francisco and hauled to the deck of the ship by three or four stalwart men. I inquired as to the frequency of that fish in the waters of Alaska and was told that they were abundant, the suggestion being made, which is rather startling, that halibut have been caught in Alaskan waters that weighed 250 pounds. I was then told they were being sent to Boston in refrigerator cars from Seattle. I was profoundly impressed with the possibility of not only an added but perhaps an adequate food supply of fish from Alaskan waters if the industry was being pushed with any degree of vigor. Fifteen years have elapsed since then, as I recall the time. I will ask the Senator, as I have asked him, if he can tell us to what extent that industry is being carried on at the present time?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not looked up those figures for some little time, but my recollection now is that out of about 65,000,000 pounds of halibut consumed in the United States about 60,000,000 pounds come from the Pacific coast and Alaskan waters and only four or five million pounds from the Atlantic waters. That industry does not need this legislation to develop it. What it needs, so far as American enterprise is concerned, is some legislation along the line which we tried to get here some time ago to meet the competition of the Canadian Government and Canadian fishermen and to meet the restrictions that they are imposing upon our people in order to compel this business to go to Canada. They are forcing it there, and our Government apparently does not do anything to meet those restrictions and the burdens that the Canadian Government imposes by its orders of council upon our fishermen, and especially upon our halibut-fishing industry. They want to get it concentrated there and transport these products over the Canadian Pacific into the United States, and they are doing it. There are not many carloads of fish coming from Seattle now simply because of those orders in council which are concentrating this business at Prince Rupert. That is a wise thing from their standpoint, and we ought to learn from them, but we do not; and it is not going to be long until that great industry, with all its accessories, will be carried on in Canada.

Mr. President, this bill as introduced would not increase the supply of food. In my judgment, it would decrease it, because if the Government goes into the catching, curing, and marketing of fish and all that sort of thing, people who are in that industry now will go out; they will quit, and we shall have a smaller supply than we have now.

The provisions along the lines of the amendment as it would read with the amendment of the Senator from Nevada I think may be good. It might be well to make some changes there, but, of course, it is difficult to frame an amendment of this sort on the floor of the Senate. The idea, I think, is good in the first part of it as limited by the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. I do not believe, however, and I think his amendment permits it, that we ought to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to purchase buildings and purchase land and purchase ships and all that sort of thing for this purpose now. I think if it is to be an emergency proposition it would be well to limit it to the renting or leasing or chartering of whatever vessels or buildings are necessary. So I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada, unless the amendment does provide for it, that he strike out the word "purchase." It seems to me we ought not to authorize the Secretary to purchase land and buildings and vessels for this temporary purpose. If he can get buildings, of course, he can rent or lease them. If he can find vessels that he can get, of course, he can lease those for the emergency. Especially do I not think that we ought to authorize him to buy land at any rate. I wish to make that suggestion to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any doubt that the idea of the Senator is right that this matter is limited to the war and that it would be rather absurd to go to work and purchase land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just suggest to the Senator in that part of his amendment to strike out the word "purchase."

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that if it became necessary for the Department of Commerce to establish a refrigerator plant on the Pacific coast, it would be necessary to have some land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. You can lease the land for temporary purposes. Surely the Senator does not think the Government will put in very much of a refrigerator plant with $250,000 and do much along the other lines proposed. I can not conceive that the war will last so long that it would warrant anything like the purchase of land and the erection of a refrigerator plant. We are going to be in a mighty bad way before it is over if that is the case.

Mr. PITTMAN. There are various kinds of fish in the Pacific waters to-day that are not caught for commercial purposes, but incidental to the catch of salmon. There is no available market for that kind of fish and there is no doubt the Government would stimulate the catch of those fish to a great extent if it purchased them. If it purchases them, it has to have some kind of a plant. Land is expensive and I think it is well enough to place in the amendment the word "lease" instead of "purchase."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that would be better.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended. I do not want to delay this very important emergency legislation that is pressed with such vigor and is insisted upon with such precipitate haste. So I am not going to take any more time, but I do hope, at any rate, that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nevada will be adopted if any provision of this sort is to go in the bill. The whole proposition ought to be left to the careful consideration of the Fisheries Committee and brought before the Senate and considered on its merits and with a view to the adoption of a permanent policy and one from which real good can be expected.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, of the amendment strike out the words "or purchase" before the word "buildings," and after the word "charter" at the end of the line insert the word "or," so as to read:

He is hereby authorized and directed to hire, charter, or rent buildings and land.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that we ought to insert "or lease" after the word "purchase." It is easily conceivable that there would be some fishing sheds, structures of very little value, and it would be very much more economical and desirable in every point of view to purchase rather than lease them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would see no objection to the purchase of buildings of that kind. The main purpose I had with reference to the purchase was to cut out the buying of land. I do not think we ought to go into the land-purchasing business in connection with this measure.

Mr. WALSH. I have the same idea with the Senator, but an inconsequential lot could be purchased. Of course, as the Senator from Washington has said, $250,000 will not permit any expensive purchase of land or buildings. I think we ought not to cut out the right to purchase the land, but give the right to lease the land as well.

I move accordingly to amend the amendment, if it is in order, by inserting the words "to lease" after the word "purchase" in line 3, page 2.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, before the word "buildings," insert the words "or lease."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the word "or" be stricken out before the word "purchase."

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "or" before the word "purchase," so as to read "to rent, purchase, or lease."

Mr. PITTMAN. I accept that amendment, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, assuming that this legislation is desirable and necessary for the moment, neither of which propositions do I agree to, I can not help calling the attention of Senators to the policy of the Government in the past, which has prevented developing resources of the kind which would be useful under such emergencies.

The Senator from Nevada—and I do not hold him at all responsible for it, because I know that he is in accord with the contention which I have made—will recall the construction of a cold-storage plant in Alaska on land which the owners of the plant believed they could obtain title to without trouble, and in endeavoring to obtain such title they have been prevented by the very narrow and I may say ridiculous policy of the Government. Undoubtedly if they had been encouraged to invest their money and extend their business a very large additional supply of fish would be available at this time; but not even being able to obtain title to a piece of property on which they had built a plant costing $250,000 they naturally refrained from investing any more money in any such business under such conditions.

I hope when the clouds roll by and we resume our normal condition the necessities which arise at such a time as this may be used as an example for a broader and a more liberal policy on the part of the Government, especially in relation to Alaskan affairs.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has fairly well stated the proposition in regard to the halibut plants in Alaska. I take it, however, that his statement is in error with regard to the attitude of the administration relative to that plant.

Mr. WEEKS. No; I did not say the administration; I said the Government; I am not holding the Democratic Party or any other party responsible.

Mr. PITTMAN. I misunderstood the Senator, then. I understood that he did not mean the administration, but that he meant the executive department of the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. The policy was just as bad under previous administrations as it has been under the present.

Mr. PITTMAN. The truth about the matter is that that portion of the Government known as the Congress of the United States is responsible. The bill granting title not only to this halibut company but to other companies in a similar position was recommended by the Committee on Territories to the Senate, and efforts have been made to pass such legislation through Congress. It has utterly failed. As a matter of fact, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that Congress has not stimulated private enterprise either in Alaska or anywhere throughout the West. Congress for years has pursued a policy of discouraging in every possible way private enterprise throughout that country, and it is doing it to-day through a sincere but erroneous theory with regard to conservation.

As far as this halibut plant is concerned in this matter, that company is responsible for its own troubles. It attempted to acquire land upon which to build its plant through fraudulent mining locations. It located mining claims when there was no ore or mineral of any kind or character on the ground. They attempted to acquire title to land on the water front of Alaska not only without the authority of law but by subterfuge and in violation of law. After it had built an extensive plant there it then came to the Government of the United States and said, "We attempted to acquire this land fraudulently, we can not do it, and now we ask you to give us title to it." The bill that the Committee on Territories considered was not for the purpose of giving title to this halibut company, but for the purpose of authorizing the Department of the Interior to sell to the halibut company the land upon which its plant was situated, and to sell to other similar companies throughout Alaska the land upon which their plants were situated.

As far as interfering with private industries is concerned this bill, in my opinion, does not do it. The concern which the Senator from Massachusetts referred to deals in nothing but halibut. The only other concerns on the Pacific coast deal solely in salmon. There are thousands of other fish, good food fish, on that coast which no one deals in and never will deal in until the United States demonstrates that it is a profitable business. The waters, as I said, are teeming with smelt; they are teeming with cod, with herring, and with other fine fish, and yet there is no one on the Pacific coast who will buy them and take them to the market. The United States Government can buy those fish, can create a market, can increase the production, and then when this war is over, it having been demonstrated to be a profitable business, you will find that private enterprise will go out there and take up the business where the Government left off.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit a question? The provision of the bill is that the Government shall buy and sell. Now, what will be the modus operandi of disposing of those fish? Suppose the Government buys a large quantity of smelt or herring, both of which I believe are very numerous in Alaskan waters. It transports them to Seattle and from Seattle by rail to Boston. Will the Government have warehouses through which to dispose of its fish to the people of Boston or New York or Philadelphia? What will be the process?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know, and of course it would only be a conjecture on my part; but the example of the Perkins committee shows that it can be done successfully even without owning warehouses. You can take the fish into an existing market, like you take them to the Center Market in the city of Washington, and place them there with a limitation of price and yet with a profitable result. I take it the only trouble with the smelt proposition was bringing them across the country and delivering them to people out here in the East. They successfully did that, and I take it the Government would follow the same course.

I do not want the Senator to understand that I favor this character of legislation. I do not favor it any more than I favor a whole lot of similar legislation. I am only moved by the necessity of the case. I do not know that the necessity exists, but I can not bring myself to contradict those who have given careful investigation to it and say the necessity does exist now; and as this matter is limited solely to the war and is going to deal in the development of a new industry, the purchase of fish that are not purchased to-day, the distribution of fish that are not distributed to-day in a large measure, I take it it can not injure private enterprise. It does not come in competition with anybody. It does not permit the Government to go into the fishing business, but it is going possibly to demonstrate to the people of this country that there is another large field of industry which private enterprise may enter and develop.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. It is undoubtedly a form of Government ownership and operation in competition with private enterprise. There is no question about that from my viewpoint. But I am troubled on another point. We are all hoping this war is not going to last forever. We are all hoping this war will not last more than one year, or two years at the outset.

Now, it is proposed in this bill that the Government shall lease or purchase or, I suppose, build ships for this trade. Those of us who have been on Alaskan waters know they have seagoing ships there to navigate those waters. The Government will have, in some way, to provide for the transportation both on land and sea of this product. I have given the subject only casual thought, but it occurs to me that the emergency may possibly pass soon after the Government gets ready to engage in this trade, and that whatever money is appropriated and spent—for we are going to have a lot of clerks in Washington and elsewhere; I do not know exactly what they are going to do in Washington, but that is the provision of the bill, the usual corps of clerks, a bureau to be built up month by month—the quarter of a million dollars or whatever the sum may be, will be dissipated before any practical result can be secured.

In saying that, I am not putting myself in direct antagonism to the bill. If I could be made to see that it would be a workable scheme and that the food supply could be conserved and added to by this method during the existence of the war—although I am not so much scared as a good many people are about the food supply—I do not know that I should antagonize it beyond possibly casting my vote against it, if I do not change my mind; but to me it looks like rather an Utopian scheme along a line of endeavor that does not appeal to the minds of many conservative people in this country. If the Government is going to buy and sell fish, the Government can buy and sell any other commodity which is produced in this country or, I think, in any other country. We can not wipe out the fact that it is trenching upon individual enterprise and individual initiative when the Government undertakes this scheme or any other similar scheme, and many such are being agitated at the present time.

I wanted simply to record my fear that the whole matter would simply result in the expenditure of money; and nowadays, when we are voting away billions of dollars in an hour, of course a quarter of a million dollars does not amount to much. There was a time when a quarter of a million dollar appropriation would be carefully scrutinized by the Congress of the United States; but it has become a matter of amusement rather than of serious concern, for there seems to be no end to our appropriations and very little concern on the part of public men as to where we are going to land in the matter of appropriations; but, Mr. President, there will be a day of accounting so far as our appropriations are concerned; there will be a day of liquidation in this country, when they who are being loaded down with enormous taxes and who will be compelled to pay interest on an enormous indebtedness will ask themselves the question whether or not the Sixty-fifth Congress was not rather overliberal in the matter of spending the people's money.

With that observation, I have nothing further to say in regard to the proposed amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not think this amendment quite meets the situation. I do not like it as well as I did the original amendment to the bill which I offered; but I appreciate the expressions from Senators favoring efforts to develop this industry rather than entering upon the business of the catching and marketing of fish by the Department of Commerce, as they put it. The Secretary of Commerce especially commends the first portion of the bill, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has said, but in his letter he also at the conclusion has this to say:

> The enactment of this bill into law is recommended.

He recommends the provisions both of the first part of the bill and of the second part of the bill.

The bill as originally introduced and referred to the Committee on Fisheries, of which our deceased friend, the late Senator Lane, of Oregon, was chairman, was one in which he took great interest, and as to which he was determined, so far as he could, to report favorably—the bill which I have introduced as an amendment here—without reference to any great war emergency. He was heartily in favor of it as a general proposition. Still I do not wish to prolong the discussion, and I will say that I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], so far as I am concerned. I believe, having offered the amendment, I have a right to accept the proposed amendment to it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Florida before he accepts the amendment? I should like to know whether the Senator from Nevada would not agree to a modification of his proposed amendment so as to authorize, but not to direct, the Department of Commerce to engage in fishing, so that in the event that the Secretary could not make proper arrangements he would still have the power to go ahead and catch the fish? I merely desire to know whether or not the Senator from Nevada would accept that modification of his amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will state that I am sorry that I can not accept the suggestion. I should like to be in perfect harmony with the Senator from Wisconsin, but I should not be willing to vote for any amendment which would even authorize the Secretary of Commerce to engage in the fishing business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

Mr. PITTMAN. I believe that if he were authorized to do so he would engage in the fishing business, just as much as if he were directed to do so, for I believe it is the desire of that department to engage in business of that character. I would not vote for any amendment that would give the department that power or for any amendment that did not by its very language prohibit them from engaging in that kind of business.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, independently of any question of that sort, the purpose of this amendment extends very much beyond that, and that, I think, is a most important purpose. This development is needed now especially, but it would be needed under any conditions. It is "to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized, or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods." That is an important work under any conditions; and that, I think, is the main thing to be accomplished by the amendment. Then, in addition to that, it will provide for a source of food which, under present conditions, is most desirable.

But, as I have said, without insisting upon the amendment as I originally introduced it, which might lead to very extensive discussion and debate on the whole bill, I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the matter now, the bill authorizes——

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator to excuse me for a moment? Do I understand the amendment of the Senator from Montana has been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). It has not as yet been agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am supposing that amendment would be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Very well. If that is the case, I will offer the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The pending question is on the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Montana to insert the words "or lease."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been accepted by the mover of the amendment, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was my question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it has been accepted by the mover of the amendment, but that the amendment has not yet been agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think, as the mover of the amendment, that I had a right to perfect my own amendment by accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. And consequently it became a part of my amendment, which amendment was accepted by the mover of the original amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Therefore it is now a part of the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understands that the Senator from Nevada offered to-day his amendment de novo, and therefore his is the pending amendment. The Senator from Montana now offers an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Nevada is an amendment to the amendment which I proposed on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it was withdrawn yesterday and offered anew to-day.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada was withdrawn, but the amendment which I offered yesterday was not withdrawn. The amendment which the Senator from Nevada offered yesterday to that amendment was withdrawn, and in lieu of that he offered another amendment this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nevada offers an amendment to-day as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PITTMAN. That was my intention. My intention was simply to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it was not offered in that way, but was read in full as an original proposition, and not as an amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it was read in full at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who asked to have it read as it would read when amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. PITTMAN. However, it does not make any difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not matter. The mover is entitled to place his own construction on the motion he makes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; and that is the intention I had in offering the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada offers his amendment as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Florida, and, of course, the Chair will so construe it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the "Senator from Florida" accepts the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida accepts the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. So that my amendment, as modified, becomes the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Now, the Senator from Montana offers an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Florida as modified, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the word "animals," it is proposed to insert the words "in the prosecution of such operations."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I merely want to state the purport and significance of the amendment to the amendment. As the amendment now stands, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized "to purchase, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals" as an entirely separate and independent grant of power. My amendment would grant him authority to do these things as incidental to the operations which he is authorized to carry on by the first provision of the amendment; that is to say, in carrying on operations for the purpose of developing a new source of supply and in developing new methods of using the supply, he may "purchase, prepare, cure, pack, transport, market," and so on. It seems to me that that is all that is necessary.

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is in my power, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida accepts the amendment of the Senator from Montana. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida as modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the amendment as modified be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has accepted two amendments, one offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and one offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. GALLINGER. And I ask that the amendment be read in that form as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the original proposition as it now stands modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct such operations in the United States, including Alaska, as may be necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods employed in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods; and to increase the consumption thereof; and to purchase, prepare, cure, pack, transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals in the prosecution of such operations; and to do any and all things necessary and convenient for carrying out the purposes of this act.

That for the said purposes the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hire, charter, rent, purchase, or lease buildings and lands, vessels, and fishing gear, and any and all equipment necessary or convenient for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; to employ all persons necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; to purchase, either in the open market or in competitive bids, such supplies as may be necessary; and to buy and sell fishes and other aquatic food animals, either fresh or cured: Provided, That the proceeds of any sales may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

That for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this act, including the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office, there shall be appropriated a sum not to exceed $250,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Secretary failed to read the last amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Secretary read it as part of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Florida and accepted by him.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the word "animals," insert "in the prosecution of such operations," so that it will read:

Transport, and market such fishes and other aquatic food animals in the prosecution of such operations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida as modified.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

So Mr. FLETCHER's amendment as modified was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, between lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding of such article for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to say just one word in reference to this amendment.

An amendment somewhat similar, but more restricted than the present amendment, was presented yesterday, when there were but a few in the Senate, and without much consideration, I think, it was voted down. I have modified that amendment, added to it, made it a little broader, changed the wording and therefore the sense, and I want to analyze this section for just one moment for the purpose of showing the pertinency of the amendment I propose.

Stripped of any redundancy and epitomized, section 8 provides:

That any person * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold * * * any such articles [suitable for food or fuel] for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof * * *, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony.

Mr. President, by the strict letter of this law the merchant who owns a cold-storage plant and buys fruit or eggs or anything of like character and preserves them for the purpose of selling them for a profit in the wintertime or in the fall is guilty of a felony, and upon conviction will be sent to the penitentiary. It does not make any difference how innocent his intent was, whether he intends simply to buy at one price and sell at a better price; he is held guilty if the effect of buying up any quantity of the product affects the prices, even though it affects them only temporarily.

A purchaser can not purchase in a large quantity without increasing the price of the product. Let me illustrate that. We will take a little town in my State, say, of three or five thousand people. There is a cold-storage plant there. The owner goes out into the country through the months of May, June, and July, when eggs are very plentiful and therefore quite cheap, and begins to buy up eggs, sending his wagons into the country for that purpose, for storing in his plant and holding them until the winter months, when there is a scarcity of eggs, for a better price. Now, the very fact that he sends his wagons out into the country to purchase eggs increases the price the farmer would receive for those eggs otherwise, and therefore it increases the price of those eggs to the consumers in that little town of 5,000 inhabitants. In other words, they would be cheaper in that town to the consumer if this owner had not sent out into the country and raised the price by purchasing what he desired for his business. He would be guilty of a felony for doing that, under the strict letter of this law.

Again, we all know that the hens begin laying quite prolifically during the months of April, May, and June. Therefore eggs are very much cheaper during that period than at any other period in the year, and they begin to decrease in supply gradually until the next March or April; and as they decrease in supply, the price naturally goes up in the winter months. Now, if this party who has purchased eggs at 20 cents a dozen during the summer months, when they were cheap, concludes by December that he could only get 25 cents a dozen, and that 5 cents a dozen will not pay him a reasonable profit after paying his expenses, he naturally withholds those eggs from the market until January or until February, when the price will rise to such an extent that he can profitably sell them. If he should put them on the market in that little town or in any other little town of like kind in November, he would check the advance. Therefore, if he withholds them, the very withholding tends to increase the price of eggs in that vicinity; and that legitimate business is, by this bill, denominated a crime.

Mr. President, that is not the intent of the bill. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] very candidly expressed his view as to how it should have been construed; but the trouble is that it will be construed according to the plain meaning of the words in the bill itself, and under those plain-meaning words there is but one conclusion, and that is that the purchasing, storing, or withholding for higher prices makes the party committing the act guilty of a felony. If the proponents intended that this bill should simply cover cases of an attempt to corner the market—and that is really what it is—to buy in such quantities or to withhold the products, if they have them, for the very purpose of cornering the market and thereby committing an offense, they ought to have said so in the bill.

Inasmuch as that is the intent, I should like to ask any Senator why we should not make the bill read just exactly as we intend it to mean. If we do not intend it to cover those cases where a man purchases during a period in which the product is cheap and keeps it for an advanced price, if we do not intend to make that a crime, then let us insert something in the bill that will make it so read.

Reading this amendment again, it is as follows:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding of such article for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market.

That takes the classes of purchasers entirely without the intendment of this proposed penal statute, and it certainly should be inserted that they may know, and know when the bill passes, whether or not it is safe for them to purchase those products which are quickly destroyed by the elements, hold them in cold storage, and sell them at a higher price during the winter months.

Now, we ought to encourage cold storage just as much as possible, and especially upon eggs and fruits. We will take eggs, for instance. Often if we had no cold storage in this country, eggs during the months of May and June would be as low as from 8 to 10 cents a dozen. Then they would have to be practically consumed within a short period. The country would be glutted with them. That would be an injustice to the producer without any great benefit to the consumer. So, too, if we did not have the cold-storage places when eggs were extremely scarce in the wintertime there would be no method of supplying that deficiency and bringing them down to a reasonable price.

Mr. President, we want to encourage the storing for legitimate purposes, and we do not want to penalize any legitimate line of business. This will make the law mean what the proponents of it say they intend it should mean, and I ask that it may be adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he will accept the following amendment to be added to his amendment? The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment the following:

It is further provided that farmers' cooperative and other exchanges or societies of a similar character shall not be included within the provisions of this act.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is in the bill now; it is in the section which follows, I think. Certainly I understand that to be in the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator refer to section 6?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is in a part of section 8.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are cooperative selling societies as well as farmers' exchanges.

Mr. McCUMBER. It could be put in as a separate amendment, and as there might be some question about it I wish the Senator would allow us to vote upon it as an independent proposition. That will give us time to look up the bill and see the applicability of his proposed amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall withdraw it, Mr. President, and offer it as a separate amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the trouble with the amendment offered to the section is that instead of clearing up an ambiguity it creates an ambiguity. The office of a proviso attached to a section is to remove from the body of the section a portion of what would otherwise be included within its language. When, therefore, you attach to the main section of this bill a provision to the effect that the section shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding of articles for future sale for such advanced prices as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market, you by implication say that the body of the section does and would reach that class of transactions unless you put in the excepting proviso, and a court in construing the language of the section itself would be largely influenced as to the purpose of Congress in passing the section by the language of the proviso.

We fought all this out yesterday, and the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota is not in principle different from the amendment which was submitted last night. It varies from it just enough to save it from a point of order, but does not vary from it in principle.

I am very much in earnest about the section that is offered, and I hope it will remain in the bill. I hope it will stand here unimpaired. I have no hesitancy in saying that I believe we are embarking upon very dangerous legislation at this session of Congress. We are proposing to substitute individual opinions for law and the decree of departments for the rule of the people crystallized into statutes. The excuse that is offered for this retroversion to despotic methods is that certain grave necessities now press upon the people. I have insisted heretofore and now insist that there is not an evil of such magnitude as to warrant the creation of a tribunal to deal with it that can not be defined and limited and reached by general law. I believe in the rule of law and not in the rule of men.

The proposition which comes here now is a rule of law. This amendment lays down a rule of law that, if it be enforced, will prevent the hoarding which is made for the purpose of forestalling the market. It will prevent the practice of gathering great quantities of foodstuffs together for the purpose of forcing a starvation price. It will apply to the backs of the wretches who engage in that practice the lash of the criminal law, and I want to see it enacted with all the vigor it can possess.

I maintain, as I maintained last evening when we were discussing a similar amendment, that the section without any proviso or exception is clear and plain, that it will reach evils and will not trespass upon the rights of those who are acting in accordance with the principles of fair dealing.

The section itself—I am repeating much of what I said last night, because the same question is being repeated here—simply provides that any person engaged in interstate commerce in articles of human food or necessaries who shall store, acquire, or hold such articles "for the purpose of limiting the supply" or affecting the price shall be guilty, and so forth. The intent, the purpose, is the controlling thing. The man before he can be convicted must be shown by his acts or by his words to have formed the purpose not of buying to gain the advantage of a natural advance in the market but of buying for the purpose of advancing the market, not of holding for the purpose of obtaining the natural advance of the market but of holding in order to force the market up. The distinction is perfectly obvious and is one which has been drawn in substance and effect in numerous cases construing the Sherman Act. It is held, as the Senator from Oklahoma has suggested in a remark to me, as the common law.

It never was against the law for a man who raises a crop of wheat to hold that wheat until he found a market suitable to him and then to sell it. It never was against the law for a man who believed that the wheat was lower than the price it might justly be, who believed that there would be an advance, to buy wheat in order to profit by that advance. It never was against the law for a man to go into the English market place and buy provisions that he might gain the advantage of a rise in price. But it has been against the law for a man to buy great quantities of wheat for the purpose of shutting off the natural supply and thus forcing the price up, and it has been against the law for a man to force all the market, namely, to be guilty of the act of going into the common and public markets of England and there purchasing the necessaries of life to such an extent as to force the product to an unnatural price. That kind of conduct was a crime under the Roman law. Always the controlling thing has been the intent, the purpose, the object of the individual, and no court has ever held under the Sherman Act, the language of which is very similar to this, that a man is guilty of a violation of that act who simply buys something hoping that it may rise in value. But if a man buys in order to force the value up, if he gathers to himself great quantities of provisions in order to force the price up—in other words, if he creates monopoly in order to practice extortion—that is the great touchstone; that is the controlling thing; that is the determining factor by which you ascertain whether he is guilty under this law.

Now, I beg that we may be permitted to pass this section in a form that is virile, strong, forcible. I want its terrors to hang over those who may be tempted to forestall the market. I want its drastic provisions to be visited upon those who may seek to monopolize or control the necessaries of life. And I want its provisions for the further purpose, that I prefer this rule of law which men may read and men may understand to the individual dictation of some food regulator or some other man authorized to substitute his personal opinion for the law of the land.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota may be defeated, for the reason that I think it weakens the section. I think it places the whole section in a false light. I think it will endanger its proper construction in the courts of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is again making the same argument that he made yesterday, and his argument has no relation to the wording of the amendment itself. We all agree with the Senator that cornering the market for the purpose of exacting extortionate prices for any food product should be punishable. It is punishable to-day under the present law. We do not need another law for that purpose. If that is the only object, then we have a law upon our statute books to cover it at the present time.

I call attention to the fact that this amendment does not mention the word "extortion." The amendment does not refer in any way to the cornering of a market. It simply makes it an offense to go out and purchase any kind of a food product when the natural consequence of those purchases advance the price of that product to the consumer. I gave a simple example a short time ago which I think I am justified in repeating at the present time. If a man owning a cold-storage plant in a little town of 5,000 people should go out into the country with his teams and wagons to gather up the farmers' eggs during the months of May, June, and July, that act of itself does affect the price of those eggs to the purchasers and consumers in that little village, and that act is made a crime under the provisions of this law. Now, let us be perfectly fair with the law and construe it according to what it says. It says, and I use the first proposition of acquiring, "any person who shall acquire such product for the purpose of affecting the market price thereof." How can he go out and purchase without affecting the market price thereof? The greater the demand is upon the supply in his neighborhood the greater the price will be, and therefore the very act of going out and purchasing these products is known by him to be an element that will raise the price of that product, and he has committed a crime in doing that simple act.

Then, again, when it comes to selling, suppose he goes out here in the city of Washington to-day; I imagine he would have to pay about 35 cents a dozen for farmers' eggs. He stores them and when cold-storage eggs are worth 40 cents a dozen in December he thinks that 5 cents a dozen will not give him a sufficient profit upon his investment and therefore he holds them. He knows if he has a million eggs here in the city, that withholding them from the market will necessarily advance the price. If he puts them on the market, it will drive the price down.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a minute. He is withholding them from the market, and he knows the very act of withholding them naturally increases the price of the product, and for that act he has committed a crime. I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. REED. I was just going to ask the Senator what he thought of the practice of a man in the city of Washington getting control of a million eggs and holding them? Does the Senator think that would be quite a proper thing?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer. I will say, if the man purchases those eggs in the country for 35 cents a dozen and it costs him 10 cents a dozen to gather them and store them, he has not committed a crime if he holds them until he can receive 5 cents more a dozen. That is what I think.

Mr. REED. No; but I understood the Senator's previous remark to be that the man would have a right to hold them in order to advance the market. I say the man has a right to hold what he obtains for the purpose of gaining a natural advance in the market; but he has no business to acquire a thing and hold it in order to force the market up. That is the distinction. But we are just going over the same ground we have been over. I do not desire to take the Senator off his feet, but I wish to ask as a parliamentary question whether this section was not adopted last night in the Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Chair is advised by the Secretary that it was not.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what I understood, of course, or I would not have attempted to amend it at the present time.

Mr. President, this proposed law reads "if he holds them for the purpose of affecting the market price thereof." He knows that withholding them will affect the market price. Any man who has that quantity of eggs must necessarily know that if he put them upon the market it would decrease the price. What I am insisting upon is that it ought not to be made a crime to hold an article just as long as it is necessary to hold it to get a resonable return upon the investment, even though withholding it for a month would affect the price of eggs to an extent that would advance their price.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that in his opinion a man in this country has a right to acquire enough foodstuff so that withholding it from the market will advance the price and that he has a right to pursue that course until he has by gathering up the food of the country forced the price up beyond the point where it would have gone if he had not gathered up the food? If he does, then the Senator is occupying ground that every monopolist and every food hog in any country has ever known—and I use that term only because it has become a recent expression—has occupied. Surely I know the Senator from North Dakota does not occupy such ground as that intentionally. I know he would not consent that a man should get all the eggs of the country and hold them until he could get an arbitrary price, and all the butter, or all the beef, or a sufficient quantity of each product so that he could control the market of 100,000,000 people. The Senator can not be in favor of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not, Mr. President, and I have stated twice that there is a law upon the statute books at the present time to cover that case. It is unlawful now and you could not make it any more unlawful if you should repeat the law which prohibits it. All that I am asking is that this law shall be so drafted that it will not punish people for engaging in a legitimate business, that of purchasing fruit or eggs during the summer months, and storing them and holding them for such advanced price as would be a reasonable profit when they were more scarce, even though the buying of the product necessarily makes the price a little higher where he buys, even though the withholding of the product necessarily may advance the price to some extent where he would sell.

The monopoly part, the general common law principle against the cornering of food products, is already taken care of in our present law, and if this is not to reach further than that then there is no need for it. If it is to go beyond that then I want it clear that it does not interfere with legitimate and innocent business.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	New	Stone
Borah	Husting	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	James	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Townsend
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Trammell
Fall	Kellogg	Reed	Vardaman
France	Kenyon	Robinson	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gallinger	McCumber	Shafroth	Watson
Gerry	McKellar	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	McLean	Sherman	Williams
Hale	Martin	Smoot
Hitchcock	Nelson	Sterling

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, after the word "act," in line 18, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding of such article for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order. On yesterday we had under consideration the amendment of the committee, being section 8. An amendment was offered to that section substantially in the language of this amendment now proposed, and after that was defeated the amendment of the committee was adopted. I do not think that that situation is in any way changed or can be avoided by a Senator saying "I offer to insert at the end of the section the following," because it is in fact an amendment. If it is inserted, it must go in as an amendment whether it is called an amendment or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may be heard upon the point of order a moment——

Mr. REED. If the Senator from North Dakota will pardon me, Senators suggest to me that in view of the fact that the amendment could be offered in the Senate we might as well vote on it now. I therefore withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WEEKS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I wish to repeat the announcement which I previously made, that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is absent to meet an important engagement. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. He has a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). With the same announcement which I made on the last vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I desire to inquire whether the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a pair with that Senator, but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HARDING. I inquire if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. Having a pair with the Senator from Alabama, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Borah	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, Cal.	New	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Townsend

Fernald	Lewis	Shields	Warren

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from California will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the following:

That to aid in the production of food and forage crops the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to construct in the Colorado River, between the States of California and Arizona, such weir or weirs as may be necessary to divert water into the canals of the Imperial irrigation district for use in irrigating the lands thereunder in the county of Imperial, State of California: Provided, That such weir or weirs when so constructed shall be removed not later than January 1, 1918: Provided further, That the entire cost of such construction and removal shall be borne by the Imperial irrigation district: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall require the said Imperial irrigation district to indemnify the United States and private property interests against loss or damage to public or private property resulting from such construction by such indemnity bond or other security as he may deem sufficient and necessary.

In case of damage the Secretary of War is directed to adjust the same and pay any damage actually incurred out of such indemnity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think an amendment of that kind ought to pass without a word of explanation. I should like to know what the purpose of it is.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, in order to save the time of the Senate I had agreed not to make any explanatory speech, but in answer to the request of the Senator from Missouri, I will say that this matter is not new to the Senate. For the last two years the same work has been done, a temporary weir having been constructed in the Colorado River between the States of California and Arizona for the purpose of conserving the crops of the great Imperial Valley. There are to-day in the Imperial Valley 450,000 acres under cultivation; and if assurance of the construction of this weir is given, to be done at the expense of the Imperial irrigation district, 30,000 more acres of crops will be available for the food supply.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of War, which is so brief that I will read it into the RECORD. It is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 21, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR PHELAN: In accordance with your request I take pleasure in saying that the Imperial irrigation district was authorized to construct and maintain a temporary weir in the Colorado River near Andrade, only after careful investigation had fully established the fact that there is no reason to believe that the material interests of the Yuma Water Users' Association could not be adequately protected from any reasonable probability of injury. It is understood that the Imperial district is ready to furnish the same security for the protection of the Yuma Water Users' Association that in past seasons has proved to be effective.

It is well known that there is a large area of very rich land under cultivation in the Imperial Valley, and in the present well-known circumstances of food stringency in this country I should regard it as a grave national misfortune were the water supply from the Colorado River, upon which these crops are known to be dependent, to be cut off. It would therefore gratify me to learn that the efforts now being made to induce the Yuma Water Users' Association to withdraw their threatened injunction proceedings had been successful.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The only opposition that could possibly be made to this proposal would be from the Yuma district across the river, where there are about 30,000 acres under cultivation, and I do not know that there is any opposition even from that source. I have not heard of it, except indirectly. The Secretary of War under the amendment is given the authority, at no expense to the Government, to make this weir to save the Imperial lands and crops and to protect the Yuma Water Users' Association.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to observe that I have no authority in behalf of the committee to accept this amendment, but I understand it is an emergency measure, and, as explained to me, I see no objection to its adoption.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from California whether this irrigation project is a United States Government project throughout, or is it a private project?

Mr. PHELAN. It is a project of the Imperial irrigation district, which is a public corporation of the State of California. The Government has heretofore, through its engineers, done this work in order to better secure the Government project across the river, which is the Yuma reclamation project. The War Department has always been willing to act along this line and has taken such action for the last two seasons. These people will ask no further consideration of the War Department, because their permanent work is about to be completed, but will not be ready for use by July, when the danger season is at hand and when the river is so low that there may be no water for irrigation. Therefore it is proposed to put in a temporary weir, against which the water will back up to a depth of 3 feet to enable it to run into the intake of the Imperial irrigation district.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer an amendment, to come in as a new section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. Before the last section in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the act of August 30, 1890, entitled "An act providing for an inspection of meats for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases, and for other purposes" (26 Stats. L., p. 414), is hereby amended so as to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture, within his discretion and under such joint regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury, to permit the admission of tick-infested cattle from Mexico, South and Central America, the islands of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea into those parts of the United States below the southern cattle quarantine line at such ports of entry as may be designated by said joint regulations and also subject to the provisions of sections 7, 8, 9, and 10 of said act of August 30, 1890.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word of explanation. This amendment is an exact copy of a bill introduced by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], with the exception of two amendments which have been suggested by the Department of Agriculture. The first one is in line 9, to make the word "regulation" plural instead of singular, and the second is to strike out section 2 of the bill as introduced by the Senator from Louisiana, which reads as follows:

That all such cattle when entered shall be subject to the regulations governing the handling and transportation of cattle from the districts infected with the southern, Texas, or splenetic fever.

I have here a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, addressed to the chairman of the committee, suggesting these two amendments. The provisions stricken out has reference to the transportation of tick-infested cattle in the United States; but, as the object of the amendment is to allow the entry of cattle particularly from Central America into the United States at this time, with no privilege whatever of transportation from the ports where they enter, the Secretary asked that that provision be stricken out, and that has been done in the amendment offered by me.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, is it not essential under the Senator's amendment that the cattle so imported be slaughtered at the port of entry?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I will say to the Senate that, under the amendment, the cattle must be slaughtered at the port of entry; in other words, they can not leave the port of entry for any other part of the United States.

The object of the amendment is this: In Central America—for instance, in Honduras—there are 30,000 beef cattle in good condition that can be purchased by the different organizations in this country desiring to purchase cattle for slaughter; but under the present law, being from a tick-infested region, they can not enter the ports of the United States; and the amendment simply allows, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, such cattle to be brought to ports of the United States and slaughtered at the port where the cattle are allowed to enter.

Mr. President, we find now that the conditions are such that the meat-packing concerns of this country can not purchase cattle in sufficient quantities to furnish beef to our armies when they are assembled, and this will relieve the situation. I believe every Senator wants to relieve the conditions existing to-day and allow those cattle to come in here so that they can be slaughtered at the port of entry and furnish the beef that is so much needed, not only by the people of the United States but for the feeding of the Army, as I have already stated.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KIRBY. Why can they not be slaughtered and the beef itself shipped here and thus avoid infection?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean why can not the beef be shipped from Central America?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the most of this beef will go into the packing establishments for putting up in cans for Army purposes; and it is very much better to have the live animal there and slaughter him right at the place where they are going to put up the beef than it is to slaughter him away down in South America and have him shipped up here in a frozen state.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, on page 7, after the word "products," in line 5, I move to strike out the comma and insert a semicolon and the matter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 5, after the word "products," it is proposed to strike out the comma and to insert a semicolon and the following:

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and certify to shippers the condition as to soundness of fruits, vegetables, and other food products when received at markets, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That certificates issued by the authorized agents of the department shall be received in all courts as prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply want to say that this is a provision that we put in the last Agricultural appropriation bill, and it was brought back a time or two and disagreed to by the House conferees. It simply enables the Secretary of Agriculture to use part of this money to have agents in the principal markets of the country to inspect products shipped in there and certify as to the condition in which they are received. I think it is a very important amendment and one which will result in very great good to the shippers of the country, and I hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 8 it is proposed to insert a colon and the following words:

And provided further, That farmers', fruit-growers', cooperative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character, shall not be included within the provisions of this section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, do I understand that the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have no authority under the agreement of the committee to accept it. I have not had full opportunity to investigate it. From the reading, I see no serious objection to it. It certainly is not designed to apply to farmers either in a cooperative or in an individual capacity.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a word in explanation. There are in my State, and I think in Maryland, West Virginia, New York, and California, a number of farmers' exchanges or cooperative societies, which are a sort of a clearing house for the farmers. They do not hold the products. They are simply distributing agencies, and they would seem to come under the penalty of this act unless they are exempted by special provision.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest that there are organizations of that kind in nearly every agricultural State in the Union.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That all public surveyed unreserved lands within the State of New Mexico are hereby designated, without further classification or action as subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916, known as the 640-acre homestead act.

Also a new section, as follows:

SEC. 11. That all applications for entry under the provisions of said act heretofore or hereafter made in the State of New Mexico are hereby directed to be received by the respective land officials and approved by the proper officials of the Land Department, subject to individual contest.

Also a new section, as follows:

SEC. 12. That subject only to proof of residence and value of improvements, such as wells, waters, fences, corrals, and houses, and to proof of qualifications of entrymen as provided in said act, patent shall issue for each such entry.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I will ask the Senator whether he will accept an amendment striking out the words "in the State of New Mexico," so that the amendment will apply to the public-land States generally?

Mr. FALL. I have no objection to such an amendment. In fact, if the Senators from the other public-land States desire it, I should be very glad to have it done. I have here a great deal of data obtained from the Secretary's office and from the public records, with reference to New Mexico and the conditions with reference to the classification of lands in that State, and in order not to interfere in any way with the conditions in any other State I have confined the operation of this amendment to the State of New Mexico alone. The Senator from Colorado had spoken to me, as one or two other Senators have, with reference to making this general. The chairman of the Public Lands Committee of the House has just been in the Chamber and, in conference with some of us, has suggested that something should be done and that the law must be amended. I have no objection. I should like to get into the RECORD, however, the data that I have with relation to New Mexico particularly; and I shall only detain the Senate for a very short time.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States passed the 640-acre homestead act in December. It was intended to provide homesteads for qualified entrymen where the remaining public lands generally are only fitted for grazing or for raising forage crops. Unfortunately, in my judgment, in the bill as it came from the committee the classes of land subject to its provisions were stated in the conjunctive. That is to say, the lands were designated as subject to this act which were suitable "for grazing and raising forage crops." Now, the Secretary of the Interior has been apparently unable to arrive at any conclusion whatsoever as to what lands could ever come under the provisions of this act. He has issued a circular; and I ask that in connection with my remarks the portions of that circular marked on the first, the third, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, and the eighth pages may be printed. I shall refer very briefly to one or two of the provisions, and call attention to what must be shown in the petition accompanying the application.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The classification will be made, so far as practicable, so as to exclude lands that are not chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, either because too valuable for such use or too poor for such use. Lands which are capable of producing valuable crops of grain or other food cereal or fruit are not subject to designation, being, if otherwise subject to entry, disposable under the 160-acre or 320-acre homestead law, according to their character. Lands of such arid or poor character that they are worthless or fit only for occasional grazing in connection with large areas of other land are not subject to designation and entry under this act.

* * * * * * *

The entryman must show that he has actually used the land for raising stock and forage crops for not less than three years, and that he has made permanent improvements upon the land, having an aggregate value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and tending to increase the value of the land for stock-raising purposes; and at least one-half of the improvements must be placed upon the tract within three years after the date of the entry.

* * * * * * *

PETITIONS FOR DESIGNATION.

11. (a) The proviso to section 2 of the act confers a preference right of entry upon a person pursuant to whose petition land has been designated. Any person qualified to make an original or an additional entry under this act may file an application to enter a compact body of unappropriated, unreserved, surveyed public land of the character described, which has not already been designated under this act, accompanied by petition in duplicate for the designation of such land and of the tract included in any former entry.

* * * * * * *

12. (a) The petition must be in the form of an affidavit, executed in duplicate, and corroborated by at least two witnesses who are familiar with the character of the land. For convenience in filing it is desired that petitions be prepared on sheets not over 8½ by 11 inches in size with margins of an inch on the top and the left-hand side. The petition must contain the name and the post-office address of the applicant, a description by legal subdivisions of all the lands involved properly listed by entries with the serial number of each former entry. If the application contemplates the making of an original entry under this act or if the application relates to a contiguous original and additional entry, only one petition need be filed. If, however, the lands which it is desired to have designated are comprised in two noncontiguous tracts, an additional copy of petition should be filed for each such tract.

(b) The petition should set forth in detail the character of each legal subdivision included in an application to make entry under this act and in any former homestead entries made under other acts. The information called for may be shown by means of a map or diagram whenever the facts can be advantageously presented thereby. Photographs of the land, where available, are useful in indicating its character and topography and, when presented, should be located with reference to the land lines and to the direction in which they were taken. The location of corners of the public surveys by which the applicant has determined the situation or legal description of the land should be indicated on the map or stated in the petition. It is believed that the requirements of these regulations as to furnishing a description of the land can properly be met only by a careful examination of the lands by the applicant, preferably assisted by a competent surveyor. Petitions which are deficient will be returned to the applicant for correction, or he may be required to furnish supplemental affidavits concerning matters not discussed or which have not been described in sufficient detail. Care should be exercised in the preparation of petitions, as inaccuracies and omissions will tend to retard action, while false or misleading statements may lead to the rejection of the application.

(c) In the preparation of petitions attention should be given to the following considerations:

Surface-water supply: The relation of the lands to surface streams or springs rising on or flowing across or along them should be indicated, and the location of such water supplies should be accurately described with relation to the lines of the public surveys. If there is no surface water on the land, the location of such near-by sources of water supply upon which the applicant relies or which he proposes to use for stock-watering purposes should be described.

Underground-water supply: The location of any well or wells which may be present on the land should be described and information furnished in each instance concerning the depth of well, present depth to water, and yield. If there are no wells on the land, information should be furnished concerning any wells in the vicinity which may afford an indication of the probable depth to water on the lands applied for.

Irrigability: If any part or parts of the land is irrigated, the location and source of water supply of such areas should be stated and the area irrigated in each legal subdivision indicated. If any portion of the land is under constructed or proposed irrigation ditches or canals, is crossed thereby, or is adjacent thereto, the relation of the lands to such water conduits and the possibility of their irrigation therefrom should be explained. If the lands are situated near or are crossed by streams which might afford a water supply for their irrigation, full particulars should be given as to the quantity of water available for this purpose and as to whether or not it can be applied to the lands. If artesian wells exist on or near the land or underground water is found under any part of the land at depths of less than 50 feet, the practicability of irrigating the land from underground sources should be fully discussed.

* * * * * * *

Timber and vegetation: The character of the surface of the land in both the original and the additional entry as it is at the time of application under this act and of the tree and plant growth thereon should be described and the approximate area in each legal subdivision which is of such character that it is included in each of the following general classes should be shown: Lands containing merchantable timber; lands containing timber which is not merchantable; lands covered with mesquite or similar growth; lands covered with sagebrush; open grass lands; lands covered with greasewood and allied plants; rocky wastes; alkali flats; sand dunes; lands in agricultural crops or under cultivation. If none of the above terms are applicable to any portion of the land, details of its character should be furnished. Where timber occurs an estimate of the amount of such timber on each legal subdivision should be made.

Agricultural value: The acreage in each legal subdivision which is capable of producing agricultural or forage crops by cultivation should be stated by the applicant, as well as the number of acres which have actually been cultivated. If the applicant or his predecessors in interest have made agricultural use of the land in his original entry the area planted, the kind of crops raised, the yield, and the value should be stated for the last five seasons, or such part thereof as the land may have been under cultivation.

Grazing value: The applicant should indicate the grazing character of all the lands involved by describing them as winter, summer, spring, fall, or permanent range. If the land or any part thereof has been used for grazing, the nature and extent of such use should be stated. The applicant should also furnish an estimate of the number of head of cattle or other live stock which, in his opinion, can be maintained on the land throughout the year.

* * * * * * *

(f) If the Geological Survey advises this office that it is unable to classify the land, or some part thereof, as subject to designation, this office will, through the proper local land office, furnish the applicant with a copy of the survey's report and will allow him 30 days within which to file response. At the applicant's option, he may either appeal from the finding to the Secretary of the Interior, alleging errors of law, or he may present further showing as to the facts, accompanied by such evidence as is desired, tending to disprove the adverse conclusion reached by the survey.

Mr. FALL (reading):

The tree and plant growth thereon should be described and the approximate area in each legal subdivision which is of such character; * * * lands containing merchantable timber; lands containing timber which is not merchantable; lands covered with mesquite or similar growth; lands covered with sagebrush; open grass lands; lands covered with greasewood and allied plants; rocky wastes; alkali flats; sand dunes; lands in agricultural crops or under cultivation—

And so forth.

The applicant should indicate the grazing character of all the lands involved by describing them as winter, summer, spring, fall, or permanent range. If the land or any part thereof has been used for grazing, the nature and extent of such use should be stated.

The entire matter is by the Secretary, as set forth in the marked provisions of page 8, which I have asked to be printed, referred to the Geological Survey. In the first place, the Secretary has ruled that forage crops did not include grain crops. In our country we know no forage crop except feterita, kafir corn, and the milos, which are all cereal or grain crops. Therefore we would be entirely precluded from the use of any of these lands. Then he has ruled that lands that were fitted only for grazing can not be acquired under the provisions of this act, as will be shown on page 1 of this circular. The consequence is that never could the lands of New Mexico be classified under the provisions of the 640-acre act, and under no circumstances could the people of that State ever acquire any benefit from the passage of the law enacted by Congress.

About May 28, Mr. Tallman, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, wrote a letter on this subject to the State war committee of New Mexico, and I ask that a copy of his letter to this committee may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

STATE WAR COMMITTEE,
Santa Fe, N. Mex.

MY DEAR SIR: The Secretary of the Interior has referred to me your telegram of the 2d instant advising that the State land commissioner informs you that homesteaders are asking that steps be taken to allow the land applied for under the grazing homestead act to be used for farming purposes this season, and you join in the request that immediate action be taken to that end.

In reply will say that while the purpose sought to be accomplished is no doubt commendable, there are numerous obstacles in the way which are not easy to overcome. In the first place, applications under this act already aggregate over 50,000, covering more than 20,000,000 acres, scattered, as you know, throughout the entire West. In the next place, the land must be designated before applications can be allowed. In the next place, this matter of designation has been turned over to the Geological Survey, which bureau has not as yet been supplied with necessary funds to do any of this work at all, except such as they are probably able to do right here in Washington on the basis of their office records. In the next place, the law specifically provides that there shall be no right to occupy lands applied for until the lands have been designated as stock-raising lands. As the law stands now, therefore, it seems to me that the only solution of the problem presented is to proceed as rapidly as possible and get the lands designated, or to decide that they can not be designated, so that all these pending applications can be allowed or rejected. When we consider the tremendous number of such applications and the acreage involved, it is apparent that this can not be done in a minute.

Yours, very truly CLAY TALLMAN.

Mr. FALL. I will only say that in the letter of the commissioner, which was in answer to a petition that the people who had made 3,000 applications in New Mexico might be allowed now, in the present emergency, to go upon those lands and take possession of them and bring them up and plant feterita and bean crops this year, which they can yet do, Mr. Tallman writes that under the law it is absolutely impossible; that they can not go upon the lands; and then he says that in the public-land States, as shown by their records, 50,000 entries or applications for entry have been made, embracing 20,000,000 acres of the public domain yet remaining in the public-land States; but it has not been possible to designate an acre of it; that it has been turned over to the Geological Survey; that they can not even commence the work of designation until they secure other funds; and I am assured by the Geological Survey that even with the additional funds it will be practically one year before they can even commence to designate the lands subject to entry.

I also ask, in connection with my remarks and these papers, to print in the RECORD extracts from Farmers' Bulletin No. 388—the marked provisions printed on page 6, page 11, and page 12 of that bulletin. I also ask—I presume there is no objection to this, Mr. President, and that the order is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from New Mexico. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Dry farming is also called dry-land farming or arid-land farming. It is generally defined as farming without irrigation in regions where the annual rainfall is between 8 and 20 inches. The fact that rainfall alone is not the only moisture condition which determines the crop production of a given locality is indicated by the investigations of the Office of Forage Crop Investigations of the Bureau of Plant Industry of this department, which states that for the production of such drought-resistant crops as alfalfa, slender-wheat grass, tall-oat grass, and brome grass the "investigations indicate that the minimum rainfall is approximately 16 inches in the Dakotas, 18 inches in Nebraska, 20 inches in Kansas * * * and up to 30 inches farther south." In other words, to produce a given crop the amount of rainfall necessary is much greater in the warmer regions, where evaporation removes so much moisture.

* * * * * * *

In western Nebraska good results have been obtained with winter wheat, spring wheat, oats, barley, emmer or spelt, corn, sorghum, Kafir, milo, brome grass, and in the valleys alfalfa has proved a most valuable forage crop, but its success on the table-land is more doubtful.

* * * * * * *

As pointed out in previous articles on this subject, too much emphasis can not be laid on the importance of supplementing dry farming with at least enough irrigated farming to insure garden products and forage for stock as a protection against possible failure on the dry land, because, whatever the methods adopted, there are likely to be seasons when total or partial failure will be inevitable. The meteorological records of the dry regions as a rule show that wet and dry years occur in cycles and that seasons of excessive drought occur when, except by means of irrigation, little or nothing in the way of cultivated crops can be grown.

The Office of Experiment Stations of this department has been investigating for several years the possibility and best methods of irrigating small areas in dry regions in connection with the farming of larger areas without irrigation. It has been found that although the greater part of the land lying between the one hundredth meridian on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west is beyond the reach of canals from the streams of that section, and the water supply is not sufficient to irrigate any considerable part of it by means of wells with pumps and tanks; small storage reservoirs to catch storm waters coming down coulees, draws, and small stream beds; intercepting ditches across broad slopes directing the run-off to the orchards or fields below; and the use of the soil and subsoil to store the storm waters of spring freshets, a sufficient amount of water may generally be provided to carry at least a portion of the crops over a period of excessive drought and thus make the difference between partial success and total failure.

Mr. FALL. I also ask to have printed a memorandum from Bureau of Plant Industry Bulletin No. 188, "Dry Farming in Relation to Rainfall and Evaporation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from New Mexico will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Memorandum from Bureau of Plant Industry Bulletin No. 188.]

"DRY FARMING IN RELATION TO RAINFALL AND EVAPORATION."

(Issued Nov. 5, 1910.)

Page 17: Contains a map of the United States, with the evaporation table shown by figures representing the inches of annual evaporation in various States of the Union; for instance—

In northeast Texas, southern New Mexico, and southern Arizona the evaporation per annum as shown is 52, 55, 54, 56 inches annually.

In Utah, lying northwest of New Mexico and north of Arizona, the evaporation as shown is 34, 40, 31, 42.

Page 20: Increase in evaporation marked, as we proceed southward, the evaporation in the Panhandle of Texas being 54 inches, as against about 27 inches in North Dakota. The influence upon agriculture is seen by comparing the agricultural operations along the line of 20-inch annual rainfall in the two States. This line in North Dakota passes through the head of the Red River Valley, where the rainfall has been ample for growing wheat upon the same land year after year.

In Texas the 20-inch line passes through a country largely grazing land, where agriculture is confined to the most drought-resistant crops, such as kafir and milo. "It is evident, then, that in dry-farming sections having equal rainfall the North has a decided advantage over the South, owing to the lower evaporation."

Quoting from Dr. H. L. Shantz, the bulletin says:

"That the distribution of a native grass is a good index of the rainfall required in different sections of the Great Plains. Short grass, consisting chiefly of buffalo grass and grama, crosses from Montana to Texas. Its growth on the west of the 20-inch line is as far as the opposing influences of rainfall and evaporation will permit. Its growth to the east is checked by competition with the prairie grasses. Thus we have a strip of short grass extending from Montana to Texas, limited on the west side by drought; therefore the increase in the annual rainfall as we go from north to south in the short-grass region represents the additional amount of rain needed to offset the increased evaporation.

"In Montana short grass unmixed with other grasses occurs in districts having an annual rainfall of approximately 14 inches; in Colorado, in regions having a rainfall of 17 inches, and in the Panhandle of Texas, in regions having a rainfall of 21 inches.

"The same type of native grass requires in Texas 7 inches more of rain a year than in Montana. This gives us at once a measure of the additional amount of rain required for a grain crop in Texas as compared with Montana. Furthermore, the evaporation in Texas during the six summer months exceeds that in Montana by about 20 inches. Therefore if the summer evaporation at one place in the Great Plains exceeds that at another by 3 inches a corresponding increase in the summer rainfall of approximately 1 inch at the first place is needed to offset the increased evaporation. A rainfall of 21 inches in the Panhandle of Texas is, therefore, really no better for growing crops than 15 inches in Montana or Dakota, owing to the greatly increased evaporation on the Texas plains."

REMARK.

The difference in evaporation between southern Arizona and New Mexico upon the one part and Utah upon the other would average about 13 inches per annum more in the two Southern States than in Utah. It would then require approximately 4 inches more rainfall in Arizona or New Mexico to raise the same crop than in Utah.

Therefore, assuming that a 12-inch rainfall in Utah might be sufficient for the raising of a certain crop, it would require a 16-inch rainfall in Arizona or New Mexico to raise the same crop, assuming that the soil was the same; that local conditions as to winds were the same; and that the precipitation was the same during the growing season of the crop.

Mr. FALL. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a tabulation which I have prepared from the official records in the Weather Bureau and in the office of the Secretary of the Interior with relation to the classification already made by the Interior Department of the lands of each of the counties of the State showing the acreage of the lands, the elevation of the lands, and the annual rainfall, as shown by the Weather Bureau reports from 10 to 41 years past.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Following is a list of counties, by districts, into which the Weather Bureau has divided the State of New Mexico for the purpose of compiling climatological data. This list also shows the character of the vacant public lands in such counties as set forth in Circular No. 149, issued by the General Land Office under date of July 1, 1912, entitled "Vacant public lands in the United States." Also Government Land Office districts in which Weather Bureau observation stations are located and place at which station is located, average precipitation at respective stations, average precipitation for counties and district; also elevations of respective stations and average elevation of stations in counties and district, together with term of years for which records were made at the respective stations, on which are based the tables made by the Weather Bureau as to precipitation:

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I will state without reading that the average rainfall in one-half the area of New Mexico is 9 inches per annum; that in the balance of the State it will run approximately 15 inches per annum; that, as shown by these reports that I have asked to have printed in the RECORD, a rainfall of 15 inches in New Mexico is only equivalent to a rainfall of 7½ to 8 inches in the State of Montana or in the Dakotas; in other words, that in the rainfall area of 20 inches, while at the head of the Red River Valley you can raise annually good, remunerative wheat crops and count upon them every year, owing to the evaporation in the State of New Mexico it is impossible to raise winter or spring wheat or to raise any forage crops whatsoever except the most drought-resistant crops, such as feterita, and then you can only count upon a crop once in three years.

These statements are all contained in the official bulletin. I have prepared them for the purpose of showing to the Senators here the necessity for doing something with reference to the State of New Mexico. The peculiar conditions existing there are common also to Arizona, I will say, but I am not authorized to speak for Arizona. Those peculiar conditions do not pertain in Wyoming, nor even in Utah. I may interject here, in passing, that 12 inches of rainfall in Utah is in some cases sufficient with which to raise a dry-farming crop; that, as shown by the report of the Federal officials themselves, it will require 16 inches of rain on exactly the same land, with the water falling at the same time, to raise the same crop in New Mexico that can be raised with 12 inches rainfall even in Utah, which is adjoining at the north. The reason for it is that the average evaporation per annum in New Mexico, south of the central portion of the State at least, is 55 inches per annum, while in the same section of Utah, at the same elevation, the evaporation is only about 40 inches. In other words, there is a difference of 15 inches in evaporation, and 3 inches in evaporation means 1 inch of rainfall; so that the 5 to 12 inches of rainfall in Utah are equivalent to 17 inches during the same period of the year in New Mexico, in so far as the growth of any kind of product is concerned. In these remarks of mine I am not going to take the time to read the records. They are from the official records, and I have asked to have them printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I have no objection at all to the acceptance of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, if it is acceptable to the Senators from the other public-land States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I regard this amendment as much of an emergency measure as any other portion of provision of this bill can be. The so-called 640-acre homestead act was finally placed upon the statute books after a long and discouraging effort to secure its passage not only in the last but in preceding Congresses. Its purpose, as then explained, may not be fresh in the minds of Senators, and therefore I wish briefly to refer to the fact that it was designed to encourage the occupation of and the raising of live stock upon the arid regions of the country; and of course the bill would be inoperative unless the area of land subject to homestead entry was largely increased over the amount provided for in the original homestead act.

The necessity for this legislation, and its popularity as well, is graphically illustrated by the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Senator from New Mexico. Indeed, in anticipation of the enactment of this law a great many actual occupations were effected, those going upon the lands taking the chance by doing so of their being classified as required by the statute, and being intent, of course, upon securing the advantages of the act by taking such chances.

I do not speak complainingly, Mr. President, of the Department of the Interior in referring to the delays that have attended the administration of this act, beyond emphasizing the fact that those delays seem to have become chronic not only in that but in other parts of the country, and are due very largely to those complications which spring from a multiplication of bureaus and bureau heads, and which therefore necessarily cause laws of this kind to encounter delays which, while subject to explanation, are nevertheless exasperating.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to make the statement that since I came into this body the question now under consideration has been a very live one in my State, as presented to the Senate by my colleague, and I have been in rather close communication with the Department of the Interior for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not that department could give us some relief without legislation, and I find these to be the facts:

The original bill was passed in December of last year. Early in January, immediately following, the Interior Department prepared its regulations and promulgated them. The delay in carrying out the classification is due entirely to the fact that there have been no funds available. The funds for this purpose have been appropriated by the judiciary bill, which is now in conference. This bill failed of passage at the last regular session of Congress, and the money was not available. The bill is still in conference. I think it is only justice to the Interior Department for me to make this statement, so that it can not be said that the department is itself guilty of such negligence as has prevented anything being done under the act.

While I am on my feet, I will add this further suggestion:

Since the passage of the law the situation in the West has entirely changed. While the law does prohibit any of these intending settlers from going upon the land and maintaining exclusive possession, nevertheless the fact is that throughout the West there are thousands of people who have gone out upon these lands, and they are there; and Congress is now confronted with an actual condition which does require some enactment or change in the legislation at this time, in my judgment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is certainly far from my purpose and also from my desire to impute any misconduct or negligence to the action of the Interior Department. I am satisfied that its officials and representatives are doing the best they can; but the Senator, because of his long experience in the administration of the Assistant Secretaryship of that department, knows that even under the best of circumstances its progress is necessarily slow, due very largely to its complicated machinery, and, as I said, to the number of bureaus and subheads which have more or less jurisdiction over the same subject matter.

My purpose was to suggest the cutting of that Gordian knot for the reasons which the Senator himself has just outlined, and outlined so well. I believe that with the topographical maps, which are part of the official records of the Interior Department, and with the data which they possess concerning these lands and their character, and their knowledge of climatic conditions, it would be easy to make such a workable designation of these lands as would solve the problem; but, of course, that is too much to be expected from any of the Federal departments, in view of their modern methods of transacting business. In other words, they are not equipped for emergencies, and this is an emergency.

What the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has said regarding climatic conditions in his State is substantially true of the other arid States. The average degree of evaporation is somewhat greater in New Mexico and Arizona than in Utah and Colorado; but all these States occupy what we call the arid region or semiarid region of the country. During the processes of settlement virtually all the lands which lie in a favorable position and which are susceptible of irrigation have already passed out of Government ownership and have been taken over by private parties, so that the lands subject to the operation of this law are virtually all the surplus unoccupied lands, and particularly so in view of the extent of our forest reservations.

Consequently, to enact by an amendment to this bill a provision whereby the 640-acre homestead act will be available to all these lands really carries out the purpose and object of the bill, does no injustice to anyone, and the Government by its enactment does not run the risk of any legislative inclusion of areas of land to which the law will be subject which should be excluded from it. So, in view of the prior occupation and ownership of all available lands which enjoy sufficient rainfall to justify the raising of the ordinary crops, inasmuch as all lands susceptible of actual irrigation have also been taken, and inasmuch as the reservations have been made so extensive as to comprise in some instances practically one-half of some of the States, the throwing open of the remainder by legislative enactment will bring into immediate occupation the lands which are designed to be covered by the act of December last, will relieve that part of the situation to which the junior Senator from New Mexico has referred, and I think it exists in all these States and relieves those who have taken advantage of the largess of the Government by going upon and actually beginning the work of the improvement of this land of the contingency which now hangs over them, and by means of which their work and their occupation may have all been in vain.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to know of the Senator from Colorado whether he proposes to make the 640-acre homestead act applicable to all public-land States.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; because all the remaining public-land States, or practically all of them, are within the arid region. There may be some public land in the Senator's State.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator care to make it applicable to lands within forest reservations?

Mr. THOMAS. No; we could not do that, because the so-called 640-acre homestead act does not do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Neither is the 640-acre act applicable, as I understand it, solely to the semiarid region.

Mr. THOMAS. It is applicable to arid or semiarid land.

Mr. ROBINSON. Take, for instance, the State of Arkansas. Does the Senator propose to make the 640-acre homestead act applicable to the remaining public lands in that State?

Mr. THOMAS. I shall have to answer that question by asking the Senator from Arkansas another. Are there public lands in Arkansas which are subject to occupation under the old homestead act?

Mr. ROBINSON. There are.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, of course, the State of Arkansas should not be included within this designation, and the amendment which I propose is too broad.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the very suggestion I was going to make to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I am obliged to the Senator for making it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Upon the statement made by the Senator from New Mexico I do not know that I should object to its application to New Mexico, or even to the State of Colorado from the statement which the Senator from Colorado is making, but there are other States besides the State of Arkansas in which there are public lands, and the 640-acre homestead act ought not to be made applicable to them.

Mr. THOMAS. The suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas is both timely and appropriate, and I am obliged to him for calling my attention to it. Of course, I proposed this amendment upon the assumption that the arid-land States were practically all the States in which public lands are still to be found.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator's assumption in that particular is erroneous. There are nearly three-quarters——

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has enlightened me in that respect, and I thank him for it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state further, for the purpose of informing the Senator, that in the State of Arkansas there are approximately three-quarters of a million acres of public lands, and under the law now no portion of that land can be entered under the 640-acre homestead act.

Mr. THOMAS. And never was designed to be.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would be a gross diversion to attempt to make it applicable anywhere except in the semiarid-land States.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no quarrel between the Senator and myself on that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that, but I suggest to the Senator that he modify his amendment so as to make it applicable to those States.

Mr. THOMAS. I have assured the Senator that I will so limit it. It ought to be so limited. I do not think there will be any objection to that whatever. Certainly there will not be from me. I fully agree with the Senator that public land in a State like his should not be subject to the act, because they are not appropriate to the operation of this law, nor could the law fulfill its function if it were carried into such States as the one the Senator so well represents.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think I can satisfy the Senator from Arkansas that none of the public lands within his State would come within the provisions of the 640-acre homestead act. In the first place——

Mr. ROBINSON. That is certainly true. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me further?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that perfectly, but the proposition of the Senator from Colorado is in reference to the 640-acre homestead act. The original proposition was to make it applicable to all the remaining public lands wherever situated.

Mr. STERLING. But by the terms of the acts themselves they would not be applicable to a State like the State of Arkansas. The public lands are not of the character described in the 640-acre homestead act.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me, the Senator from Colorado originally tried to make it applicable to all the remaining public lands.

Mr. STERLING. I do not understand that that was quite the contention of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the language of the amendment. The Senator from Colorado has indicated his purpose to modify his amendment, and when he submits it in a modified form we can readily determine whether or not it should be accepted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If my colleague will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The act itself provides that all public surveys on reserved lands within the State of New Mexico, or if it be modified as my colleague has suggested applicable to all lands, are hereby designated without further classification or action subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916, known as the 640-acre homestead act. That act would not be applicable to the lands of Arkansas, and consequently I do not think it is necessary to qualify it, although if the Senator thinks it necessary it might be well to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Colorado is in error concerning that matter. I do not know that it is material to pursue the controversy further, since the Senator from Colorado has accepted my suggestion and is willing to modify his amendment. It does not matter what lands the original 640-acre homestead act was applicable to, if in this act we make it applicable to all public lands that constitutes an amendment of the original act.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Why not follow the precedent in the form of legislation upon similar subjects? It has been upon various occasions, at any rate, the custom to name the States to which a certain homestead or public-land law should apply. It has also been the custom within my experience in Congress at times to except certain States from the application of the law. The purpose has been to avoid any controversy of any kind or character. My colleague and myself being in accord as to the necessities in New Mexico, I confined the amendment to New Mexico. I am perfectly willing to agree to extend it to the State of Colorado, and to the State of Arizona, if the Senators from that State want it—I see neither of them here—and to the State of Nevada, or any other State. I think it would be better to extend it by name to certain States possibly rather than to make it general and except certain States.

Mr. THOMAS. I will change the form of the amendment in view of what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has said, by asking to insert, after the words "New Mexico," on the second line of the first page, the words "Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, South Dakota, and North Dakota." I have not mentioned the State of Montana, because I was informed that the Senators from that State do not desire the extension of this proposed amendment so as to include that Commonwealth.

Mr. FALL. I am glad the Senator included the State of Wyoming, because the junior Senator from that State is absent on official business of the Senate, and he spoke to me about it some time ago and hoped that the provision of the act might be extended to his State.

Mr. THOMAS. I have named these States upon the assumption that if the Senators representing them were present they would desire their inclusion. Of course, if objection is made to the inclusion of any of them the bill can be very easily further amended so as to conform to their wishes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad the Senator leaves out of the amendment the State of Montana, because I am absolutely opposed to applying it to the State of Montana. It would be of no benefit; it would be unjust and undesirable there, in my opinion. I am very glad he has left out the State of Montana, but I do not believe that any State ought to be included unless it is known that the Senators from those States desire to have it included.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is right about that, but I am unable to perceive any valid reason why the Senators from arid States would object to the extension of this amendment over their territory.

Mr. MYERS. I did not state why I am opposed to applying it to Montana, and as long as the Senator does not propose to include Montana there is no need to state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I would be incapable of including the Senator's State in any measure when he objected to it.

Mr. MYERS. I know that; but I see no reason for stating my reason.

Mr. THOMAS. There is none whatever, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. MYERS. I merely wish to say, however, it seems to me that no State should be included by name unless it is known that both the Senators from the State desire it.

Mr. THOMAS. I will take the chances on these other States and include them in my amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from New Mexico accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FALL. It is perfectly satisfactory to me. It exempts, I understand, such States as desire exemption.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have some interest in the pending amendment. I introduced a separate bill relative to the public lands in two of the Indian reservations in my State intended to accomplish the same purpose that the Senator from New Mexico has sought to accomplish by his amendment and now sought to be accomplished by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

I think that so far as the State of South Dakota is concerned, all the remaining public lands are subject to entry under the 640-acre homestead law. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the description of these lands as given in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as a part of his last report to the Secretary of the Interior. The lands are divided by land districts. In what is known as the Bellefourche district the lands are described as prairie, grazing, farming; for Butte County, for Harding County, the same; for the counties of Lawrence and Meade they are described as mountainous, broken, and grazing; for the land district of Gregory, in which there are the three counties, Bennett, Gregory, and Mellette, the lands are described as grazing, sand hills, very rough and rolling.

Take the entire Lemmon land district in the northern part of the State in which is found the Standing Rock Reservation to which my bill applies and they are all described as prairie, rough, rolling, many buttes, and stony hills.

Take the Pierre land district and they are described generally as rough, hilly, and ridgy, and as low and wet, with sand bars, rough, hilly, and including what is known as the Bad Lands.

So in the Rapid City land district the land is described as follows: Partly mountainous, timbered, mineral, grazing, and agriculture.

Mr. President, since this report was made the 320-acre homestead law has been in force in South Dakota, and I think it is safe to say that all the lands that could be considered as agricultural and not grazing lands, or too rough for agricultural or grazing either, have been taken under the 320-acre homestead act. So I do not believe there is any land whatever left in South Dakota that would not be designated, if the Secretary of the Interior could proceed to designate it, as coming within the provisions of the 640-acre homestead law.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator if he has a copy of the law there which states the lands the law now applies to?

Mr. STERLING. I did not quite catch the Senator's question. Will he state it again?

Mr. HUSTING. I asked the Senator if he would be kind enough to state to which lands the law as it stands to-day is applicable?

Mr. STERLING. The law is now applicable to the classes of land described in the act itself; to lands which are, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops and do not contain merchantable timber and are not susceptible of irrigation from any known water supply. That describes the lands subject to entry under the provisions of this 640-acre act.

Now, as to the need of this act and what the act will do now so far as the subject under discussion by the Senate for many days is concerned and that is the matter of food supply. I wish to quote briefly from a couple of letters I have received from men living in that region who have lived there for many years and who are thoroughly acquainted with the conditions there. The first is a letter which bears no date, but which was received within the last two weeks from Mr. O. J. Jacobson, of Eagle Butte, S. Dak. He says:

We earnestly urge immediate passage of bill directing Secretary of Interior that all lands applied or open to entry under the additional homestead laws in the Cheyenne Indian Reservation be immediately designated as stock-raising land without field investigation as this land has been open for seven years, and all farming land filed on leaving only rough stock-raising land to be filed on.

What is true of the Cheyenne Indian Reservation is, I think, just as true of the Standing Rock Reservation, north of it.

If this bill is not passed immediately designating these lands as stock-raising lands, stock raising and farming operations will be seriously curtailed, as many applicants under said homestead laws are unable to safely settle, stock, and farm lands.

Of course, under the provisions of the 640-acre homestead law the settler or the applicant for the designation goes on the land at his peril if he goes in advance of any actual designation by the Secretary that it is stock-raising land.

I call attention to an extract or two from another letter received from Mr. William M. Potts, who for many years lived at Mobridge, on the edge of the Standing Rock Reservation, and who has traveled again and again throughout the length and breadth of this reservation and understands the conditions thoroughly, and who is a thoroughly reliable man. He says:

As to designation of this land as stock-raising lands: Practically all of the vacant land—in fact, all of it left on these reservations—was designated by the Secretary of the Interior as land coming within the provisions of the enlarged homestead act; that is, the 320-acre act.

That is, when the 320-acre act was made to apply to South Dakota practically all the vacant land on these reservations was designated as coming under that act.

Certainly the land that has not been entered at this time under that act can be pretty generally considered as being stock-raising land purely and suited only for grazing and the raising of forage crops, using the words of the act.

He further says:

If an inspection of each individual tract for which application is now made shall be required by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the delay in making the designations and the delay in making entries on this land for the coming spring, which is only three months distant, will cause a great deal of inconvenience. It does seem to me that the Secretary could properly and with much inconvenience saved to the department as well as to those who wish to put stock out here in the spring, designate all of the remaining vacant lands in this State as grazing land. They certainly are that.

* * * * * * *

I believe that this law is without doubt going to result in the importation of a number of cattle by the homesteaders this coming season, as they are reasonably sure to make sufficient to be able to keep them, and it will do much to cause the development of the western portion of this State.

I can speak partly from my own personal knowledge as to conditions there, and what these men say in these letters is, I think, absolutely true. Take it on the other Indian reservations in my State, not named in the bill which I introduced—and I did not name them for the reason that I had not had any correspondence in regard to them—those reservations have been open to settlement for many years. They were opened long before the Standing Rock and the Cheyenne River Indian Reservations were opened. All the lands fit for cultivation at all were taken on those reservations either under the 160-acre homestead law or subsequently under the 320-acre law, and all that is left is the very broken, hilly, mountainous land fit only for grazing or possibly for the raising here and there in small patches or coolies of what may be termed forage crops.

It seems to me that the development of the country is hindered, that the food products which we might have are much curtailed by the failure to designate these lands as stock-raising lands, allowing them to be taken by the settlers who will move there and will raise all the stock which the land is capable of raising.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will pass. It is germane to the very subject we are discussing here, namely, that of food production, and is one of the most important provisions, it seems to me, that could be enacted in this bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. HUSTING. I ask that the Secretary report the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. HUSTING. I will yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to withdraw the amendment which I offered, and to amend it by inserting after the name "New Mexico" on page 1, line 2, and also after the name "New Mexico" in line 9, the names "Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed on page 1, line 2, after the words "within the," to change the word "State" to "States," and after the name "New Mexico" to insert "Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota"; also in line 9, before the words "of New Mexico," to strike out "State" and insert "States," and after the name "New Mexico" to insert "Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota."

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be stated as proposed to be amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the amendment as proposed to be amended be now stated.

Mr. HUSTING. The amendment proposes to change the homestead laws now obtaining, so that in the States mentioned homesteads may be taken up in areas of 640 acres. The 640-acre grazing homestead act of last session was before the Public Lands Committee and was very carefully considered. After the insistence of Senators from the public-land States the committee finally reported the present 640-acre homestead act, which provides as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising lands subject to entry under this act lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family.

That act was passed upon the reports and arguments of Senators that in certain States of the West 160 acres are not sufficient to sustain a family; that they desired to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior the power to select and designate certain areas of unproductive land, or lands of such character that 160 acres were not sufficient to invite anybody to take up and to make a homestead. That law was passed; but now it is proposed under the pending amendment:

SEC. 10. That all public surveyed unreserved lands within the States of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota are hereby designated, without further classification or action, as subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916, known as the 640-acre homestead act.

SEC. 11. That all applications for entry under the provisions of said act heretofore or hereafter made in the States of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota are hereby directed to be received by the respective land officials and approved by the proper officials of the Land Department, subject to individual contest.

Therefore, it is now proposed that all public unsurveyed unreserved lands within the States named shall be opened unreservedly, without any further classification, to 640-acre homesteads; in other words, it is a blanket provision which increases the homestead act from 160 acres, which has been the area provided by the homestead acts from time immemorial, and increases it to 640 acres. It means, of course, that it wipes out the provisions under which the Secretary of the Interior might designate those lands; in other words, lands chiefly valuable for farming purposes may be taken up in 640-acre tracts; lands containing merchantable timber may be taken up in 640-acre tracts; any sort of land, no matter for what it is useful, may be taken up in 640-acre tracts or lots. That is overturning the policy of the Government right here on the floor by means of a rider—a policy which has obtained in this country for a very long time.

I do not recollect that any Senator proposed any such thing as that or any such drastic measure as that before the Public Lands Committee, of which I am a member; at least, it has not been proposed during the time that I have sat there as a member. It was represented there that they only wanted the 160-acre tracts extended to 640-acre grazing tracts in these particular semiarid districts, where, it was said, 160 acres were not sufficient to attract homesteaders; but now, after that act has been passed, they come here, without having the matter considered in committee at all, and propose to attach this legislation as a rider to this bill, and to ask the Senate to overturn the policy of this Government in regard to the size of its homesteads, a policy which has existed ever since there have been any homestead acts, at least as to the maximum of the homestead.

I want to protest against the passage of such an amendment. The homestead laws of this country ought not to be radically amended, or practically all of the safeguards be wiped out after a few moments' discussion, when an Agricultural bill is under consideration and when the homestead act itself is not up for consideration.

If it is time to change the policy in those States, it ought to be done in the orderly and regular way and not by a rider attached to this bill at the eleventh hour of its consideration, when it does not deal with homesteads at all, but deals with an entirely different subject.

This is properly a public-land proposition. I have never heard an argument previously made upon this floor that all restrictions should be wiped out, and that hereafter the great public-land States of the West should parcel out these lands in 640-acre tracts without regard as to whether or not they contain merchantable timber, without regard as to whether they contain any water power, or have any irrigation rights, or anything of the kind. The amendment says without further classification all public lands shall be subject to this 640-acre homestead law. It does seem to me a very poor and bad policy to dispose of whatever good lands and timbered lands there are in those States in tracts of 640 acres.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. If the lands are of a character that the Secretary of the Interior, when he comes to designate them, would most likely designate them as coming within the 640-acre homestead law, what harm is there in now designating them as coming within that law, so that they may be entered and occupied?

I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am proceeding simply on the theory that the lands are lands of such character that when the Secretary came to investigate and examine them, he himself would find that they came within the provisions of the 640-acre homestead act.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota has stated that as his judgment in the matter. This 640-acre homestead act is only four months old. The Senator from South Dakota had much to do with the passage of the act. Why was this provision placed in the law last December, stating that the Secretary of the Interior should select these lands if the fact was, as the Senator says, that all these lands come within that designation?

Mr. STERLING. I will say, Mr. President, in answer to the Senator, that meanwhile there has been in force a 320-acre homestead law; there has that time elapsed since the passage and approval of the 640-acre homestead act in which settlers could file on land under the 320-acre homestead act. The remaining lands are lands that hardly come within the provisions of the 320-acre homestead act because none of them are what might be termed agricultural lands, fit for raising crops. They are only fit for stock raising.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to reply to the statement of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. THOMAS. I want to answer the question of the Senator from South Dakota, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me.

Mr. HUSTING. I will yield to the Senator from Colorado for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course this law applies to some States which are partly arid and partly humid, as well as to States that are entirely arid; hence the necessity of a classification of those States which are partly humid and partly arid.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; that was the reason; but under the proposed amendment that distinction is entirely wiped out and the States having semiarid and humid areas all come within the terms of the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the amendment includes but very few of the Western States; and the conditions now being pictured by the Senator from Wisconsin do not obtain in the States named in the amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. Will the Secretary please read the names of the States embraced in the amendment? I have not a copy of the amendment here.

The SECRETARY. They are the States of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I merely want to repeat what I said a moment ago: That this 640-acre homestead act was passed last session, and that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] had much to do with the preparation and passage of that act. In that act it was not thought necessary to open up all the lands to entry under the 640-acre act, but it was especially provided in section 2 of that act—

> That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising land subject to entry under this act lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it was believed by me at the time of the passage and approval of that act that nearly all the remaining land left in South Dakota would come under its provisions. It was further believed that the act having been passed there would be an early designation of lands, so that they could all be entered under the act.

Mr. HUSTING. I do not think the Senator will seriously claim that there has been a great change in the conditions since the 640-acre homestead act was passed last December. If the limitation was necessary last December, it is necessary now. I desire to state, further, that the 640-acre homestead act was primarily a grazing act. It was to provide sufficient land for grazing purposes. It was argued then that it was advisable for the reason that 160-acre homesteads would not afford sufficient grazing land, and therefore in order to encourage grazing—not agriculture, but grazing—the area should be extended to 640 acres. It is now sought completely to change the purpose of the act, and instead of being a grazing act, it is to be an act allowing 640-acre tracts to be acquired not only for grazing but for agriculture, for power, or irrigation purposes, or for anything else.

It was claimed that the limitations placed in the act of last December, the 640-acre homestead act, would exclude the possibility of there being taken any compact tract of land that was fit for agriculture or which contained merchantable timber or which was susceptible of irrigation so as to make it agricultural land; but the original purpose of the 640-acre homestead act is now sought to be changed so as to open the door wide for the taking up of tracts of 640 acres of timberland, of the finest agricultural land, and of land that may be irrigated.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he has any idea that in the four States named there are remaining any public lands of the great value he is now indicating? Does he believe that there are any valuable timber lands remaining on the public domain of those States or any irrigable lands?

Mr. HUSTING. That have not been taken?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. HUSTING. I hope so. I hope the Senator is not concerned about homestead laws in deserts where nothing grows. I hope that there is some use to which this land can be put.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator will permit an observation, I should like to say that the very people who insisted upon a classification of these lands when the measure was before Congress were those who were afraid that lands would be taken up which were not valuable enough. They were not concerned about the other lands, but there are no other such lands of any consequence in the States mentioned.

The Senator is simply speaking upon a mere theory, not with reference to a fact.

The Senator also overlooks the fact that since last December over 50,000 entries have been made upon western lands under the 640-acre act; and those people are there clamoring for an opportunity to go upon those lands and establish homes; but the lands are not classified, and, under the law, the entrymen can acquire no rights whatever under those circumstances. Does not the Senator think that an emergency exists, therefore, and that something should be done?

Mr. HUSTING. I do not think any emergency in respect to the homestead act obtains now that did not obtain last December. I should like to ask the Senator, who has been connected with the Interior Department, whether he knows of any committee of Congress having to do with public lands that ever reported out a bill of this character? I do not know of any. I do not know that the Department of the Interior has ever recommended a homestead act of this kind, or that it has ever considered an act of this kind. The Senator, as I understand, has been Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and he can probably state whether, in his experience, the Secretary of the Interior has ever made a recommendation that all lands in the public-land States named should be opened under a 640-acre homestead act, thus completely revolutionizing the public-land laws of the United States?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No, Mr. President; and I do not know of anybody else who has favored any such thing. The people of the four Western States named are merely asking that this provision apply to those States only. We believe, knowing the conditions in our States—and speaking for my own State, I am quite sure—that no harm will come to the Government or to anybody else if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. HUSTING. Well, that is the Senator's judgment; and it is entitled, of course, to consideration, but that does not touch the point that I have been urging. We are asked here to change the law, to revolutionize the homestead laws of the United States, and to do it in the form of a rider on a bill under circumstances where the policy and the advisability of doing so can not be discussed or be considered in committee and an opportunity afforded to secure the help and advice of the Interior Department. The Senator from New Mexico suggests that there are no public lands of value left in New Mexico. I trust that is not so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I said, Mr. President, not of such a value as the Senator has in mind, and not such a value as he is attempting to attach to the lands which he is describing.

Mr. HUSTING. I am only speaking of lands in the State of New Mexico, for instance, that are exempt from the operations of the 640-acre homestead law as it obtains to-day, namely, lands valuable because of merchantable timber on them and lands susceptible of irrigation. Now, if there are no lands valuable for these purposes, why extend the law? The law, then, so far as New Mexico is concerned, is applicable and nothing need be added to the scope of the statute, because if the public lands that are in that State have no merchantable timber upon them and are not valuable for agriculture because they are not susceptible of irrigation, then the Senator gains nothing by this proposed amendment if adopted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe that the Senator misconceives the scope of this amendment. By this amendment it is the very purpose to designate the lands as of the character described in the 640-acre law. That is precisely what is claimed, that the remaining lands are of the character referred to in the section-homestead law, and therefore should be classified by blanket classification, because of the peculiar exigency which exists at the present time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Secretary of the Interior should designate all of the remaining public lands in New Mexico as lands of the character described in the 640-acre homestead act, would the Senator be satisfied?

Mr. HUSTING. I would not be satisfied unless he truly so characterized them.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator does not think the Secretary would do it untruly, does he?

Mr. HUSTING. I am not assuming that. The Senator is asking me whether I would be satisfied if the Secretary designated all of these lands in that way.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under the statute it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. Now, if in the use of that discretion, he should declare that all of the remaining public lands in New Mexico came within that description, the Senator would have no grounds upon which to base a contest?

Mr. HUSTING. I am not speaking now of a legal proposition. I say that if the Secretary of the Interior should designate all the lands lying in New Mexico as not coming within these exceptions, and did it wrongfully and corruptly, he would be subject to impeachment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTING. I take it for granted, and I presume the Senator has taken it for granted, that under the present statute, although the discretion of the Secretary is broad, his functions are confined to the ascertaining certain specific facts, and those facts are named in the act, namely, that the lands designated for homestead entry in 640-acre tracts must be those that are "chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family." If he finds those facts, and if facts they are, it is entirely satisfactory; but if he does not, then the Senators from the State of New Mexico or other western States have nothing to complain of if all their lands come within that description, because they will be so designated.

Mr. PITTMAN. This is what I am endeavoring to get at. The Senator voted to vest in the Secretary of the Interior the right to determine that fact; we delegated that authority to him. Now, have not the two Senators from New Mexico just as great ability for determining that question as has the Secretary of the Interior, and do they not possess just as deep sincerity?

Mr. HUSTING. They are not called upon to determine that question. The determination of that question is not within their province.

Mr. PITTMAN. They by this amendment say that all the lands in that State are of the character described in the statute.

Mr. HUSTING. Well, the Senators from the State, distinguished and able as they are, are not intrusted with the functions of the Department of the Interior, and it is no reflection upon the Senators from those States to say that we object to a policy which revolutionizes the homestead laws, and which wipes out whatever safeguards there were surrounding the 640-acre homestead law.

I will state to the Senator from Nevada that I refrained from objecting to the 640-acre homestead bill with a great deal of misgivings at the time it was under consideration, and I only did so because Senators serving on the Committee on Public Lands from public-land States said over and over again that they wanted these lands opened up for stock raising. They made no statement at that time—and that was only four months ago—that there were no public lands left in their States with merchantable timber on them, or which were susceptible of irrigation, or which were of such a character that 640 acres were not reasonably required for the support of a family. In the prospectuses that have been sent out from some of these States I have never seen anything to the effect that all the valuable lands in those States were taken up; that no lands were left in those States that were fit for agriculture, that were susceptible of irrigation, or that contained any timber. I have never heard that statement made before by anybody.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think that there is now any appreciable quantity of merchantable timber left on any of the lands of the States named in the amendment that are not included within a forest reserve?

Mr. HUSTING. I do not want to pass upon the question of fact raised by the Senator. I do not want to pass upon that question of fact in opposition to the statements some Senators have made; but if that is true, and assuming it to be true, why is there need of any extension?

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir.

Mr. FALL. We are not seeking to change the law at all; we are simply seeking to put the law into effect. I have read into the RECORD a document showing that it is impossible for the law to be placed in effect, not that it is impossible to designate the lands sooner or later, but simply that we can not get the benefit of the law.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator that he can get the benefit of the law by attaching a small appropriation giving the Department of the Interior the money with which to do the work of designating.

Mr. FALL. I will answer the Senator. He can not get rid of the argument simply by throwing it off and saying, "If you do this or do that, or do the other thing." I presumed the Senator was making an argument based on an understanding of the proposition.

Mr. HUSTING. I am not trying to throw anything off. I am trying to meet the argument of the Senator from New Mexico. I say that if it is only a question of the inability of the Department of the Interior for want of money to designate these lands, a simple appropriaion put in this bill will enable the Secretary of the Interior to accomplish that task. On the other hand, if there are no lands to be designated other than lands incapable of irrigation and containing no timber, then this provision is not needed, because then everything can be so designated by the Secretary of the Interior. From the glowing accounts I have heard of the great West and the portions of the States of that region I myself have seen, I believe that there are many millions of acres of land in the West capable of irrigation and many other millions of acres on which there is some standing timber. I hope so, because I understand it is the ambition of Senators from these States to attract settlers and homesteaders there; but upon the statement made that there are no lands fit for agriculture, no lands left in all this great domain that can be put to the plow, seeded down, and made arable, no lands that can be irrigated, and no timber lands, I am afraid that the multitude of settlers looking for homes will not flock to those States. I prefer still to stick to my hope that these States contain many, many acres of land that will at some time bloom and be fruitful with the crops that we now grow in States farther east.

I just want to say, in conclusion, that if this is a meritorious measure, if the time has come when the homestead law should be changed in the West further than it was changed when the 640-acre homestead law was enacted, let it be considered as that law was considered, through a committee; let the matter go before a committee; let it be considered; let the bill be reported out; but do not go and overturn a policy which has obtained since men began to come here and seek homes and take up homesteads by a rider on a bill, with only a few hours' debate. I do not think long-standing policies of that kind ought to be thrown lightly aside in the manner that is being attempted.

If anyone is trying to throw aside things I want to shift that responsibility from my shoulders and say that the ones who are trying to throw aside things are the Senators who are attempting to overturn the laws and quadruple in size the areas of land which were obtainable under the old homestead act. I do not think it ought to be done. I do not think it is wise under any circumstances such as these, and if it is to be done at all it ought to be done so that the Congress of the United States knows what it is doing, and does not vote for a policy which may result disastrously because it is tacked on to a bill which has merit.

Mr. FALL and Mr. SHEPPARD addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator has yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. FALL. I shall be glad to answer it, if I can.

Mr. PITTMAN. Section 10 of this bill makes provision for the reservation of certain lands from the scope of the act. It provides for the reservation.

Mr. FALL. That is, the unsurveyed and the reserved lands.

Mr. PITTMAN. I mean by that it also states that the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate water holes and springs, and he shall not designate land that is necessary for right-of-way purposes, for the travel of herds back and forth.

Mr. FALL. Those are reserved lands.

Mr. PITTMAN. They are not reserved until he designates them as——

Mr. FALL. As reserved.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, it says that he may designate those lands.

Mr. FALL. Of course, if he does not, then they are subject to any homestead act. They are subject to-day to the 160-acre homestead act or to the 320-acre homestead act.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, let me see, and see whether or not this language does reserve it:

That all public surveyed unreserved lands within the States of—

So and so—

are hereby designated, without further classification or action, as subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916, known as the 640-acre homestead act.

That means all of the unreserved public lands of those States. Now, in that area there are certain springs and water holes, and certain land that is essential for right-of-way purposes in grazing stock.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Section 10 of the act reads as follows——

Mr. FALL. It reserves those.

Mr. PITTMAN (reading)—

That lands containing water holes or other bodies of water needed or used by the public for watering purposes shall not be designated under this act, but may be reserved under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910; and such lands heretofore or hereafter reserved shall, while so reserved, be kept and held open to the public use for such purposes, under such general rules—

And so forth.

Mr. FALL. I understand, I think; and if the Senator will just allow me I can show him the situation in a second.

The first section of the pending amendment preserves the act in its entirety, except that in so far as the homesteads are concerned they are designated, and not left to be hereafter designated. The section to which the Senator refers, which says that such water holes shall not be subject to location under the 640-acre act, is preserved in the third section of this amendment. It is provided that the Secretary can reserve certain rights of way for stock driving. He can still do that; but those water holes, the Senator will understand, were not reserved from entry under the 160-acre or 320-acre or the 640-acre or any other homestead act; nor were these driveways reserved under any such act. They are still open, in so far as this act is concerned. They are exactly in the condition that they were left in the act of December 29, 1916.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied that that is the intention of the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Well, they are. I am confident of that.

Mr. PITTMAN. But, as I take it, under section 10 there is something to be done in the future by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FALL. But, Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Wait a minute. Before he gets an opportunity to perform that act, by section 10 of the amendment you withdraw that power by stating that all of this land is subject to entry.

Mr. FALL. Under the terms of this act which the Senator is referring to, Mr. President, if it were attempted to put any further reservations or classifications in this amendment, I will be very frank to say that I would not insist upon the amendment at all. It is for the purpose of getting away from classifications that the amendment is offered. The amendment itself leaves the lands, the driveway, and the water holes under the terms of the act of December 29, 1916, but simply designates the homesteads, so that no further designation is necessary.

Mr. PITTMAN. If section 10 of the old act did not expressly use the word "designate," and did not impose upon the Secretary of the Interior the duty of designating the land that is exempt from the operation of the act, I would agree with the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I can say to the Senator that there is not an unoccupied water hole from the north to the south or from the east to the west or from the northeast corner to the southwest corner, transversely, obliquely, or in any other direction, in the State of New Mexico; and this amendment was drawn with reference to the State of New Mexico. However, the Secretary of the Interior has been proceeding to have filed in his office maps of all the driveways and runways in the State of New Mexico under the provisions of this act. Now, section 10 of the act does not designate lands which are not subject to designation or which are subject to withdrawal under the original act. There is no intention under heaven to secure a water hole or to stop a driveway. If I wanted to secure a water hole, I would go and locate a 160-acre homestead on it, or a 320-acre homestead, and there is no provision of law by which I could be prohibited from doing it in New Mexico. If I wanted to stop a roadway by locating a piece of land across the 1 or 2 mile limit, I would go and locate a 320-acre or 160-acre homestead, and that would not be prohibited.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, there is no doubt but that there are all kinds of ways of getting water holes and springs; but while there may not be any water holes and springs left open in the State of New Mexico, there are to-day springs and water holes that are left open in our State. They are used in common by agreement.

Mr. FALL. I was simply stating as a fact one side of the proposition as to New Mexico and stating my intentions and my conclusions of law as to the condition in which the homestead act of December 29, 1916, would be if this amendment were adopted exactly as it reads. I have none of the fears which disturb the Senator as to the stopping-up of the roadway or the acquisition of water holes, because, as I say, that can be done anyhow if anybody wants to do it. Unfortunately, probably, for the State of the Senator, the act of December 29, 1916, does not suspend the 160-acre or 320-acre homestead act as to water holes in Nevada.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is apparently sincere in his belief that whenever one of us from the Western States mentions public lands, we are making a raid upon the heritage of the people of Wisconsin. I understand that some people who have had their pie and eaten it are inclined to think that those of us who are struggling with the development of the West are incompetents, or else we are worse than grafters. Of course we do not agree on that proposition to start with, and therefore we differ fundamentally when we attempt to consider any proposition affecting our lands.

Mr. President, the object of the 640-acre homestead act was to allow a man to have a homestead upon which he could make a living, and that is what the act says. The provision that it should be chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops was simply a description. The intention was that if 640 acres of land were required for a man to make a living for his family, and there was that much public domain, that man, a citizen of the United States, had a right to take the 640 acres which was reasonably required for the support of a family.

That was the whole object of the law. Unfortunately, sir, my voice was not listened to in the Public Lands Committee. Had it been, there would have been designated in the State of New Mexico not less than eight sections for any homesteader engaged in the stock business. I have undertaken on more than one occasion to read into the RECORD here the official records from the Agricultural Department and the Department of the Interior with reference to conditions in New Mexico. I am familiar with them. The Senator from Wisconsin, of course, is not. I am somewhat familiar with land legislation. Of course he, so far, is not. He apparently has not paid much attention to it. I am familiar with public lands and the conditions existing in the greater portion of the West. Of course, he has evidenced that he is not.

Mr. President, I have undertaken to show by the records which I have introduced here just exactly the conditions with reference to the rainfall in New Mexico. I have explained them not from my own judgment, made up from living in New Mexico for several years and having had it rain on me very little, but from the official records of the Weather Bureau, from the old Army posts back 50 and 60 years, where the Weather Bureau has preserved its records up to the present day, and in recent years it has established measuring stations all over the entire State. I have collated here, from those official records, the annual rainfall of New Mexico. The Senator from Wisconsin knows nothing about it, and can not know anything about it so long as he pursues his present course.

We have had in the entire northwestern portion of the State of New Mexico an average of 5.76 inches of rainfall for 40 years back. The Senator from Wisconsin would starve to death; he would not know how to turn around; he would not know how to get his breath; he could not last to make a speech such as he has made here under those conditions in New Mexico.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, where is that?

Mr. FALL. That is in San Juan County—one of the finest, one of the most productive, counties in the State, and one of the greatest fruit regions on the face of the earth—San Juan County, N. Mex., where the average rainfall is 5.76 or 5.71 inches. In Arizona and all along the southern line of Arizona and New Mexico the annual rainfall is never more than 9 inches. Not once in 30 years has it been more than 9 inches. At El Paso, Tex., it is approximately 9 inches, while the evaporation there is 54 or 55 inches. The Senator from Wisconsin could not imagine anything to equal it. His imagination is not sufficiently vivid for him to grasp the propositions involved in a discussion of the public-land question of the great arid West. The Senator, as I said, knows nothing about the public-land legislation; and my reason for saying that is that he is appalled at the idea of overturning the policy of the Government in granting a man 640 acres. I might refer the Senator to the desert-land act of 1889-90-91. We had the 640 acres; and I want to read from that to show the learning of the Senator, as well as to inform the other Senators.

In New Mexico in the attempt of these people to get homes under the desert-land act allowing them 640 acres, from March 3, 1877, to June 30, 1915—within the last two or three years under the 320-acre provision rather than under the 640-acre provision—they have applied for 11,047 entries. The natural conditions to which I have just called attention are such that it has been impossible, from 1877 down to the present time, for the people in my State to acquire title to more than 1,426 out of 11,047 desert-land entries. The land laws have never been fitted to New Mexico. The trouble about New Mexico has been that it has been legislated for by just such gentlemen as the Senator from Wisconsin, who knew nothing about it. It has been a ward of the Government. It has not been a State in the Union until the last five years. It has been a football for the Department of the Interior and for every experiment which every $60 clerk desired to inaugurate and initiate and for the abuse and vituperation of Senators who are desirous of showing that they are the guardians of the people's wealth. New Mexico has not been a State; it has not had a voice here; it has not been able to insist upon its rights. Never has there been a land law passed which has been fitted for New Mexico. Had it not been for the fact that the old Spaniards, coming into New Mexico 340 years ago, had some common sense, we would not have been able to acquire homes for the 450,000 people of New Mexico at all. I will state for the Senator—and he can search the records for himself and verify the information if he has any desire to ascertain really the facts with reference to New Mexico—that with 75,000,000 acres of land within her confines, under all the laws that have been passed by the United States Government in its beneficence, the people of New Mexico have never yet been able to acquire title to more than 3,800,000 acres out of 75,000,000; and they are living now, sir, upon lands granted by the King of Spain, who understood something of the conditions of those who took the standards of civilization into New Mexico. The legislation of the United States has simply been tending always toward restricting further development, because those lands were taken from Spain, or from Mexico, its successor, and placed in the careful guardianship of such Senators as the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, the people of New Mexico who are asking for this legislation are whom? I undertook to put the records in here. I had no intention of making a speech. I assiduously avoided taking up any of the time except to put in the RECORD the official records to which I called the attention of intelligent Senators.

Mr. President, 3,000 homesteaders have gone with one horse and one wagon, or at times two horses, from the State of Texas, the State of Oklahoma, the State of Kansas, and other adjoining States since the passage of this act into the State of New Mexico, seeking homes for themselves and their families. Each of those applicants has placed in the Treasury of the United States $40 before he was allowed to file an application for those 640 acres. Estimating the number at only 3,000—and those were the last official figures that I had over two months ago—$120,000 has been taken from these poor people whom the Senator from Wisconsin is always so desirous of representing upon this floor. Some of these people hardly have money now to buy bacon to fry at their camp fires; and I can tell him that they are living in the open air, with their families camping under their wagons, and their teams subsisting on the short forage, with hardly money enough to live, waiting there and begging me to assist them in some way so that they may secure the benefit of the act which the Congress of the United States passed for them and their kind. They are the people who have made this great country. They are the people who made it possible for the Senator to come to the Senate from the State of Wisconsin—the same class of people—the pioneers, the people who built up the West, the people who made the State, that the Senator and his progenitors might take advantage of their work and of their energy and of their industry and of their hardship, and, by such appeals as he is making here to-day, secure a seat in the United States Senate.

My heart always goes out to the old pioneer, and it is with him in New Mexico now. It is his last stand. He has gone there to help us make homes. Some of us have been there attempting it now for 30 years. Every time we attempt to do a thing really to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, or to make a home on the desert where a man can gather some measure of living for himself and his children, we are confronted with such speeches as we have just listened to here.

Mr. President, these are the people for whom I appeal. I am a cattleman in New Mexico as well as a farmer, and I own my land. I am not seeking a 640-acre homestead. If the Senate will pardon me a moment, I will say to you that this act, if passed, will cost me $10,000, because I am now using a part of the public range, and it is to my advantage personally to see that this act does not take effect and that no classification is made. I am sure that the Senators who know me at least will acquit me of any desire to pose personally, and will pardon me for being guilty of the lack of taste of projecting my personality into this argument; but it is done, sir, in refutation of the statements made and the constant charges emanating from such sources as that to which we have just listened.

Mr. GORE and Mr. HUSTING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that hereafter speeches shall be limited to 10 minutes on the pending bill and any amendment thereto, and that Senators shall be allowed to speak only once on the bill or on any one amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. I object to that at this time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there now a rule that no Senator shall speak more than twice on the same subject?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to look that up when the Senator from Oklahoma made the request. The rule passes from the mind of the Chair between times. It is never enforced except when the Senate gets ready to enforce it.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator that I will occupy only about 10 or 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon the Chair for just a moment, we will know what these rules are.

Mr. GORE. I think it is Rule XIX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The five-minute rule is the rule that has to do with the consideration of the calendar, after the expiration of the morning hour, and before——

Mr. KENYON. Well, Mr. President, most of the calendar is put on this bill now.

The VICE PRESIDENT (continuing). Before the unfinished business is laid before the Senate. There is another rule that no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate. It is a rule that the Senate enforces when it wants to, and refuses to enforce when it does not care anything about it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator from New Mexico stated that he did not intend to make a speech when he rose. I want to assure him that he has not. He has merely made a tirade, not a speech nor an argument.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to call the Senator from Wisconsin to order. He must not impute improper motives to a Senator.

Mr. HUSTING. Well, Mr. President, I felt that in stating the proposition as mildly as I have I did not anywhere near approach the abuse in which the Senator from New Mexico himself indulged with the acquiescence of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair has paid particular attention. The Senator from New Mexico spoke with reference to the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin and not with reference to the Senator himself.

Mr. HUSTING. Oh, I beg the Chair's pardon. The RECORD will show that the Senator from New Mexico did direct personal remarks against the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not catch it if there was.

Mr. HUSTING. The RECORD will show that. I just want to add, also, that the remarks of the Senator would have been more fitting to have been delivered to his constituents in New Mexico and to the legislature of his own State rather than to the Senate of the United States. The Senator from New Mexico is not the Senate of the United States. He is but one ninety-sixth part of the Senate, and has but 1 vote out of the 96. The force of the argument, if it can be dignified with the term "argument," used by the Senator was really to the effect that other Senators not living in New Mexico were incapable of casting an intelligent vote on this matter affecting the public lands of the United States unless perchance they were familiar with the boundary lines of New Mexico and possessed all the local geographical knowledge possessed by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, abuse is not argument. I know the Senate of the United States is recognized as the greatest deliberative body in the world. No one has brought that to the attention of the Senate more often than the Senator from New Mexico. Yet what would its deliberation amount to if Senators rise in their places and, instead of addressing themselves to the merits of the proposition, indulge in giving voice to their judgment and opinions of their fellow Senators instead of their judgment and knowledge of facts in a matter that is being discussed? I have not any doubt when we come to look over the history of legislation in the United States and see where the great domain has gone under the laws of the United States framed by the Congress of the United States it is not difficult to understand that the same kind of arguments, abusive arguments, were made in support of the squandering of the public domain that are always made when anyone dares to rise in his place and defend what he conceives at least to be the interest of the United States.

Why this excited resentment whenever any attempt is being made in a very, very mild degree to safeguard the public rights in the public domain? Why is it that representatives from States often seem to resent any law not drafted by themselves and sanctioned by themselves which in any way affects the public domain in their States and redounds to the benefit of the whole country? Why this snarling attitude, like the taking away of a bone from old Rover? I do not know, unless it is because Senators feel, and the Senator from New Mexico feels—and I will confine my remarks to him—that he alone is qualified and competent to draft a law regarding the public domain of the United States, and that he alone should be consulted as to whether a land policy is a good or bad thing for the United States; that no voice should be raised except his voice, and that no attempt should be made by the Senate or any member of the Public Lands Committee that does not coincide and harmonize with his idea of the conservation of the public lands.

I have heard these arguments before. These speeches or tirades are made only when there is a paucity of real argument. No one having a meritorious case needs to resort to the language of abuse. Only those whose argument is not based upon sound reason and sound judgment, in a frantic endeavor to win their point, resort to the only thing that is left, and that is abusing the opposition. It is an attorney's trick. I do not know but that the Senator as an attorney in New Mexico was accustomed to the rather profane but long ago outworn advice of the old pettifogger to the young lawyer when he said, "If the law is against you, give the jury hell on the facts; if the facts are against you, give the jury hell on the law; if both the law and the facts are against you, give the opposing lawyer hell!"

I wish again to restate why I am opposed to this proposed homestead law, and why it is not necessary to know the local geography of the country from which the Senator from New Mexico comes in order to pass intelligently upon the merits of this bill. We have had a homestead law and a definite homestead policy in this country since a time as long as men can remember. Homestead laws were enacted for a purpose. They were enacted for the purpose of preventing the land from getting into the hands of land speculators and mining speculators and all other speculators. The public domain was to be reserved for settlers because those who legislated on this subject well knew that unless the lands were properly conserved the land-grabbers would come in and instead of having a Nation of freeholders we would have a Nation of tenants, that we would have a Nation of slaves, landlord owned. That is why the homestead act was passed which has been upon the statute books I do not know how long.

Yet, notwithstanding all the safeguards put around it, even in those times the land did get into the hands of such speculators. The public domain was wasted and empires of land were given away to railroad builders for mining and timber purposes and it got into the hands of speculators.

But now it is proposed that even those small safeguards are simply to be thrown away and that the land should be absolutely turned over to whoever desires to acquire a homestead in lots of 640 acres. The extension was made last December. It was made upon the plea by Senators from various States that 160 acres were not enough for grazing land, and they persuaded the committee to stand by them on that presentation and argument.

Now, what is wanted? They come in now and ask the absolute wiping out of the restrictions surrounding the act of last December and desire to have land homesteaded in lots of 640 acres, irrespective of the nature of the land.

It is not necessary to argue with the Senator from New Mexico along the lines that have been argued for the last 75 years or more, to show why a homestead act is good for the country. Long before the Senator from New Mexico came upon the scene here, or, for that matter, came upon the scene anywhere, the policy of the homestead law was adopted. Those lands were all there at that time, and that policy is at least entitled to sufficient respect so that before anyone is successful in changing it the burden of proof is on him to show why it should be changed. The policy of a century's standing ought not to be wiped out by a rider to a bill, without argument, without any showing made as to its necessity by the mere fiat and statement of a Senator himself. The statement made by the Senator, I think, simply is, in effect, that he wants this done and it should be done.

The burden of the proof is on the Senator desiring this change. The homestead laws were enacted for a good and sufficient reason, and before they are overturned any Senator desiring to overturn them should present arguments showing why they should be overturned and why should we turn our back on a policy that we have followed and maintained for so many years.

Abuse does not dispel that proposition. Talk will not do it. What are the reasons why some people are so insistent in wiping out all the safeguards that were put around the 640-acre law so that now all lands shall be put into the same category?

I wish to remark that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] propounded a question to the Senator from New Mexico in regard to its effect upon the water holes, and the Senator from New Mexico made the statement that it did not in anywise affect the status of the water holes. Let us see. Section 10 of the act approved December 20, 1916, provides:

That lands containing water holes or other bodies of water needed or used by the public for watering purposes shall not be designated under this act, but may be reserved under the provisions of the act of June 25, 1910, and such lands heretofore or hereafter reserved shall, while so reserved, be kept and held open to the public use for such purposes under such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

What is the legal effects of the pending amendment? The legal effect of this amendment is that until the Secretary of the Interior does reserve these water holes they may be brought into the 640-acre homesteads. It can not be done under the present law because it says the Secretary shall not even designate water holes to come within the 640-acre homestead law. So they wipe out the act itself and instead of prohibiting the taking of these water holes under the 640-acre homestead act they permit them to be taken, again showing that the purpose of this act is entirely overthrown.

I merely wish to say in conclusion that this bill proposes to change the homestead laws, and in my judgment it should be defeated as being contrary to long-established policy, clearly intended not in the interest of agriculture but, on the contrary, clearly shown to be in the interest of speculators and not of homesteaders. No man can work a 640-acre homestead himself. This is clearly intended to help the speculators, to help out men who are familiar with the lands down in New Mexico or some other State so that they can secure the land in tracts of 640 acres whenever they want to do so. It is absolutely subversive of the best interests of the country; it is absolutely subversive of the settlement of the country. If New Mexico is to be settled, it has to be done by more than one family on a section. If it is going to be settled as the Northern States, it will at some future time be divided into much smaller areas of ground than 640 acres.

So I dare to place my judgment against the judgment of the Senator from New Mexico. In doing so I have no apologies to make to the Senator. When the time ever comes, and I hope it will not, when he can cast my vote and direct my course it will mark the time when my usefulness in this body is ended. I do not propose to stand here and be lectured by any Senator as to my duty in the premises. I do not intend to have my judgment even impeached and attacked by any Senator except along the lines of legitimate argument. I never intend to impeach the judgment of another Senator except along the lines of legitimate argument. I assume that every Senator in this body was sent here to vote as a representative of his State and as a representative of the United States. As it was well said by one of the Senators some time ago, to paraphrase the statement, "I am not only a Senator from Wisconsin; I am a Senator of the United States," and I propose as long as I am in this body not to express somebody else's opinion or somebody else's judgment but to express my own and to vote according to my convictions. I want to tell the Senator from New Mexico that it is not within his province to call to account the Senator from Wisconsin, because he is not accountable to the Senator from New Mexico; he is accountable to his constituents in the State that sent him here. Let the Senator try to fulfill the duties of his office as a Senator from New Mexico. He will find plenty of opportunity to tax his powers to the limit without attempting to teach other Senators how to perform their duties in the premises.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a question.

Mr. GORE. I will state to the Senator that I wish to renew my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MYERS. I am quite willing to have the request renewed now.

Mr. GORE. I renew the request which I preferred a few minutes ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to further discussion on this bill and amendments under the five-minute rule?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under the 10-minute rule. I wish to be heard for 10 minutes, but I do not care to be heard any longer than that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to proceeding under the 10-minute rule in the discussion of the amendments and the bill itself? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORE. And no Senator to speak for more than once.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that in the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, both the Senators from New Mexico being present in the Chamber and hearing this discussion and having stated that they desired this amendment to apply to their State, and both the Senators from Colorado being present and having stated that they desired that this amendment should apply to their State, I have no objection to the amendment in so far as it applies to New Mexico and Colorado. I would be very willing to vote for it to that extent, because I am always willing to trust to the knowledge and judgment and good faith of the Senators from any State in matters of policy as to what laws should apply to their States if they do not contravene the welfare of the general public of the entire country.

However, I have very serious doubt if South Dakota should be included in the amendment, because, with all due respect to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], his colleague is not here, and it seems to me that this amendment, which does overturn the policy of the Government in regard to public lands to some extent, ought not to be extended to any State unless both the Senators from that State are present and will——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. In a minute—and will go on record as saying that they favor it for their States. If the Senator from South Dakota can assure me that he knows his colleague, who is absent, favors the application of this amendment to South Dakota, I would have no objection to its being applied to South Dakota. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I am glad the Senator from Montana is willing to concede that it is a case of fifty-fifty, anyhow, and that he will, so far as the Senator from South Dakota who is present goes, put him in the same category with the Senators from Colorado. As to my colleague, I can only state that my very strong belief and impression is that he would have the same view in regard to this matter that I have myself. I do not pretend to speak for him. It is simply my belief that his views would be in accord with my own.

Mr. MYERS. I think very likely he would, because I have all faith in the statement of facts which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has made as to conditions in his State; I accept his word, and I believe that if his colleague were here he would quite likely agree with me. The Senator's statement that he believes that his colleague would quite likely do so goes quite a way to be convincing with me.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I think the Senator from Montana agreed for the most part with the view of the Senator from South Dakota when the 640-acre act was under discussion before the Public Lands Committee.

Mr. MYERS. I did agree almost entirely with the views of the Senator from South Dakota, but I do not agree with the provisions of this amendment, except where the two Senators from a State assure the Senate that it is applicable to the conditions in that State, and that they desire it. In such case I am wholly willing to give them what they want.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will permit me, I should like simply to say that I believe, if this amendment should go over until the convening again of the Senate, an amendment acceptable to the Senator could be prepared and presented.

Mr. FALL. I hope there will not be any attempt to delay action upon this matter. The Senator can reach the point which is desired by the Senator from Montana in another way. This matter will have to go to conference, and it is very easy to strike out some part of it in the event that we do not agree upon it. If the Senator will pardon me just one moment——

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator that I am only allowed to speak for 10 minutes, and I am not going to take very long.

Mr. FALL. I desire to make only one or two observations.

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator, go ahead, if he will only take one or two minutes.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from Montana is the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands——

Mr. MYERS. I have that honor.

Mr. FALL. And he knows, of course, what the general policy has been in New Mexico. We had a large donation in 1898, to aid us upon our coming in as a State, of the public lands of that State. Those were located by our land commission, which had been appointed under the act, and was then subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, upon his designation. Five million acres, one-half of our entire donated lands, have never been designated up to date, although so many years have elapsed. It has been impossible to do so. It has not been the fault of the department. It has been simply because they have not the men; they have not the force to do the work. They should be given $2,500,000. It will take years and years to designate these lands.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it is partially because I have the honor to be the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands that I have felt impelled to say a few words. I shall not delay the Senate nor the bill very long, so far as my utterances are concerned. I merely want to express my opinion as to the various States which this amendment territorially covers.

I have no objection whatever, and I can see no objection to the provision being applied to New Mexico and Colorado, because both the Senators from each of those States are here and say they want it. I am perfectly willing to abide by their judgment. A doubt has occurred to me in the case of South Dakota, as to whether we ought to assume the responsibility of voting South Dakota into the amendment, because one of the Senators from that State is not here, although what the other Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has said, as I believe about his colleague, is very persuasive to me. I have heard neither Senator from Utah go on record as to his views in any way whatever about the amendment. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is not in the city, but is absent on official business. I have, therefore, very grave doubt of the justification of the Senate including a State in this amendment where at least one of the Senators from that State does not rise and go on record, saying that it is applicable to his State, that he desires it, and that he believes that his colleague, if present, would coincide with his opinion.

I say, stripped down to New Mexico and Colorado alone, there is no objection to their inclusion with me, but I am perfectly willing to abide by the decision of the Senators from those States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he wishes to continue the session?

Mr. KENYON. We thought it might be possible to vote on this amendment to-night.

Mr. WALSH. To vote on the amendment?

Mr. KENYON. We should like to do so.

Mr. WALSH. In that case I desire to address myself for a few moments to the pending amendment, and I only regret that at this late hour there is not a greater attendance to listen to a discussion of this rather important feature of the bill.

It is rather an ungracious thing in a Senator from one of the public-land States to be objecting to a measure of this character, which by its terms applies only to another State and not to his own. I am not, however, impressed with the wisdom of this amendment; I am unable to lend my support to it; and I am unable to lend my support to it by reason of the official facts and figures touching the disposition of the land of the States that are made subject to the amendment. As the amendment now stands, as I understand, it includes the States of New Mexico, Colorado, South Dakota, and Utah.

While I recognize the very thorough acquaintance with the conditions of those States of the Senators who represent them on this floor, the fact appears to be that there is only one State in the Union—the State of Montana—in which the number of homestead entries made exceed those that have been made in the last three or four years in the States of Colorado and New Mexico. I want the Senate to have the information.

Bear in mind, Mr. President, this is under the 320-acre homestead act. For the year ending June 30, 1916, there were made in the State of New Mexico 7,068 original homestead entries; that is to say, that during the year 1916, 7,068 people found tracts within the State of New Mexico which they felt they were justified in taking under the 320-acre homestead act. That represented an aggregate acreage of 1,660,524.37. Upward of a million and a half acres were taken in the State of New Mexico in the year 1916 under the regular homestead act.

The number of final entries—that is to say, cases in which the proof was made complete—was 3,071, the total acreage being 581,928; that is to say, that over a half million acres in the State of New Mexico passed out of the Government and into the hands of homesteaders during that year. That is a pretty good record, Mr. President—1,660,524 acres entered and over half a million upon which final proof was made. Evidently the lands in the State of New Mexico are taken up with some considerable degree of rapidity under existing laws.

Now, I want to submit a few more figures. In the year 1910 1,924,145.46 acres were entered in the State of New Mexico; in 1911, 1,377,000; in 1912, 1,050,000; in 1913, 2,324,000; in 1914, 1,870,000; in 1915, 3,266,000; and in 1916, 2,831,000. The public lands in that State are going pretty rapidly. Why, Mr. President, the total number of acres of unreserved land in that State is only 26,338,379, including both surveyed and unsurveyed land; the surveyed lands being 18,437,388 acres and only 7,900,991 acres being unsurveyed.

Of course there are immense reservations in that State, but they do not fall under the operation of the 640-acre homestead act at all.

Colorado was in practically the same situation. There is no trouble with Colorado at all, so far as public land entries are concerned. In the same year 1916——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me the page from which he is reading? I presume that he is quoting from the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALSH. I am quoting from page 252 of the last report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. There were 11,477 original homestead entries made in the State of Colorado in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, representing an acreage of 2,900,270.45. Of these entries 3,981 went to final proof, representing an acreage of 759,777.74. I may add that during 1916 the State of New Mexico selected out of the public lands of that State 436,616 acres, and the State of Colorado 960 acres.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH. I do; but the Senator will remember that I am limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. FALL. I presume the Senator will compare his figures with the total number of acres there are in the State; otherwise, I do not see where the pertinency of his figures comes in.

Mr. WALSH. Really, this is a very important matter, and I should be very glad to answer the question. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed 10 minutes more to put these figures in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. WALSH. Now I will be very glad to answer the question of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I was not asking the Senator a question. I supposed, of course, the Senator was putting his figures in for some reason. I do not see how figures as to the amount of selections in New Mexico have any bearing upon the question, unless they are compared with the total acreage from which selections might be made.

Mr. WALSH. I have endeavored to give that. I have said that 26,000,000 acres in the State of New Mexico are open to entry, and that 18,000,000 acres of those lands are surveyed; so only 18,000,000 acres of land in New Mexico are open to any kind of disposition—homestead, mineral, or any other.

Mr. FALL. Of course that is a mistake. The Senator does not mean that in the broad sense in which he states it. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but the Senator is incorrect.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the Senator from Montana has the official figures before him, and is giving them.

Mr. FALL. The squatter's homestead right constitutes an entry recognized by the Supreme Court; the desert land entry is admitted; one can make final proof on nonsurveyed lands in desert-land entries; the State of New Mexico can select or can withdraw and hold absolutely subject to its own disposition for survey any lands unsurveyed in the State.

Mr. WALSH. Those facts, Mr. President, are quite irrelevant. There are unreserved 26,000,000 acres in that State altogether, and there are 18,000,000 acres that are surveyed. The fact about the matter is, as I have indicated, that in the year 1916 there were more than 7,000 settlers who went to the State of New Mexico; and I understand that there was a large immigration into that State from Texas, Oklahoma, Kansas, and other States to the east; indeed, it ranks next to my own State—Montana—and Colorado in the number of entries made, 14,486 entries having been made in the State of Montana in the year 1916; 11,477 in the State of Colorado; and 7,068 in the State of New Mexico.

Now, my esteemed friend from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], for whom I have the very highest regard, and whose judgment about this matter carries great weight with me, indeed, refers to the condition in his State, and leaves the impression, from his discussion of this matter, that there are not any more lands in the State of South Dakota that can be taken up under any act except the 640-acre homestead act. Senators will bear in mind that that act is not yet in operation. It was passed last December, but there has been no classification under it, so that no entries can be made. I give the figures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. During that time there were in the State of South Dakota 3,932 homestead entries, representing an aggregate of 653,298 acres.

There were 11,477 people who went out to the State of Colorado during the year 1916, and found each of them a 320-acre tract to which he was desirous of getting title under the law.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. Just a moment. And there were 3,981 of those who completed their final proof, and patent is in process of issue.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, my belief is that those entries to which the Senator refers as having been made in South Dakota during the fiscal year 1916 exhausted the lands that were really fit for entry under the 320-acre homestead act, and that the remaining lands could be properly classified under the 640-acre homestead act.

Mr. WALSH. I have a great deal of confidence in any declaration which the Senator from South Dakota may make about this matter, but let me give the figures. In 1910 the aggregate acreage entered in the State of South Dakota was 2,946,000.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that was long before the 320-acre homestead act was made to apply to South Dakota.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; but I want to bring it down to the present time—in 1911, 1,711,000; in 1912, 696,000—getting down pretty low—in 1913, 468,000—still lower—in 1914, 378,000—still a fall—in 1915, 321,753; but in 1916, 1,045,854.96 acres. The 320-acre act, as my recollection is, was passed in the year 1912.

Mr. WALSH. I was not advised that it was not made ap- South Dakota was passed, I think, in 1915, and there was a rush to enter the lands to which that act was applicable. It has been since I came to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. I was not advised that it was not made applicable to South Dakota from the start. In any case, there were over 1,000,000 acres of land appropriated under the provisions of that act the first year that it was in operation in South Dakota.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. WALSH. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to state that in that section of the country where the section-homestead law would become applicable a number of people are making entries, and have been ever since the section-homestead law was first introduced in Congress, under the 320-acre law, with the expectation that they would be able to take additional land under the section-homestead law; and at the present time, although the lands are not classified——

Mr. WALSH. The Senator will remember that my time is limited.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (continuing). They are making the entries under the other law.

Mr. STERLING. It is because the Senator's time is limited that I do not presume now to interject anything, although I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WALSH. I should be glad to answer any question the Senator might ask.

Mr. President, there is another consideration that addresses itself to me, and that is one of fairness. I do not think it would be a wise public policy, considering either the interests of the people of the State of Montana or the interests of the people of the Nation, to throw open to entry under the 640-acre homestead law all public lands in the State of Montana. I think it would be a mistake. But if you did that, and did not make the same law applicable to all the other States or if you made it applicable, we will say to the States of Montana and Wyoming, as a matter of course we would absorb practically all the immigration. They would not go to another State where they could get only 320 acres, when they could come to Montana and get 640.

Mr. President, it will be observed that the States of Montana and New Mexico and Colorado are rivals in the matter of securing homestead entries. Colorado comes in with 11,000 entrymen, New Mexico with 7,000 entrymen, and Montana with 14,000. Evidently immigration is directed in those two channels. Why, as a matter of course, if you double the size of the entry down in those two States, a man who has a choice will be very largely guided by that fact; and I can not believe that the Senators from those States gave due consideration to that feature of the matter. I do not believe it would be just to the other States, not to speak of the unwisdom of it.

Mr. President, I myself had many misgivings—and I say so, and it may be weighed in connection with any comments I may make on the pending bill—about the wisdom of the enactment of the 640-acre act at all, at least as applied to the State of Montana; but I think we have gone far enough. I do not believe it would be the part of wisdom in the Senate at this time, without an opportunity for careful investigation and study of this subject by the appropriate committee, without any advice concerning the matter from the Department of the Interior, and without taking the precautions and the deliberation that ordinarily attend legislation of this character, to adopt this particular amendment. Therefore I feel obliged to oppose it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have no desire—and, in fact, it is a thing that I dislike very much to do—to take up any more time in the discussion; but some very, very misleading statements of figures have been referred to by the Senator. Of course, he is giving full credit to them, but I can not allow them to go entirely unchallenged without stating the facts.

The very people who, as my colleague has intimated, have undertaken to acquire homes in New Mexico under the 320-acre homestead law have found that it was impossible for them to make a living upon them, and great sections of the country have been entirely deserted. The proofs of cultivation upon those lands, the necessary rules, were very much relaxed under the ruling of the department a year or two ago, and a great many of the settlers were allowed, under the discretion of the department, to prove up with a minimum amount of cultivation, so that they might prove up and get away from the land and might go somewhere else, where they might make a living. Whole sections of the country, great sections, such as the Estancia Valley in central New Mexico, upon the Great Plains, have been absolutely deserted. Those people believe that with 640 acres, taking up 320 acres additional, with the 320 acres additional used for grazing, by raising beans, they can make a living. Those are the people for whom I am appealing right now, and for whom I have spoken half a dozen times in the Senate recently. It is a great country for raising beans. They can raise beans on the 320 acres that they have possibly once in two years, once in three years, or sometimes three years in succession. With the addition of some more grazing land—and it requires 25 acres there to a cow—it is possible for them to make a living. All in the world we are doing is to provide that instead of having to wait five years, if the Congress has any confidence in its 640-acre act, it will allow us to avail ourselves of it.

I have put into the RECORD from the Government reports, if the Senator will read them, the figures which will convince him, if he will believe that they are correct, that 1 acre of his land in the State of Montana, in so far as its productiveness is concerned, is equivalent to 2 acres in the State of New Mexico. These are the records. It is due to physical conditions which were beyond the control of the Senator from Montana or myself. It is due to the rainfall and evaporation and the aridness. One acre of your land is just twice as productive as 1 acre in New Mexico, except where we can irrigate. Where we have water for irrigation the land is as productive as any land in the world; but without that, where you depend on the rainfall, subject to the evaporation, 1 acre of your land is just twice as productive as New Mexico land. Therefore, you need have no fear that if you do us the favor of extending the 640-acre homestead act we will take all your settlers away from you, and that you will not have any to take your homesteads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from New Mexico desired a quorum when the vote was to be taken on this amendment. It will be almost impossible to secure one at this time. I suggest——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not suggest the absence of a quorum. I understand that the Senator from New Mexico desires a yea-and-nay vote, and it will be quite impossible to get a quorum to-night. I also understand that there is a rule now that debate is limited to 10 minutes, either on the bill or on amendments, and that no Senator shall speak more than once.

It does seem that the consideration of this bill ought to be concluded to-morrow. It will have been before the Senate a week then, and every conceivable kind of amendment seems to have been presented here. Probably more will be thought of during the night. Therefore, I desire to give notice that we are going to insist to-morrow that the unanimous-consent agreement that has been entered into by the Senate shall be enforced.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a minute?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

CHAMPION COATED PAPER CO.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to state that there appears in the afternoon paper, the Evening Star, under the title "Paper company sues Members of Congress—proceedings in mandamus instituted against Joint Committee on Printing to force acceptance of bid," an article which I desire to have inserted in the RECORD; and also, following that, the reply of the Joint Committee on Printing to Mr. Frank E. Elder, the attorney for the Champion Coated Paper Co., when proceedings of this sort were threatened.

I desire to have the article inserted and the letter of the Joint Committee on Printing. I am taking this course because I think the Members of Congress ought to know what the facts are, as far as they are given here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PAPER COMPANY SUES MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—PROCEEDINGS IN MANDAMUS INSTITUTED AGAINST JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING TO FORCE ACCEPTANCE OF BID.

Proceedings in mandamus were instituted to-day in the District Supreme Court by the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, against the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress. The company seeks to compel the committee to recede from its decision to buy paper in the open market for the use of the Government during the fiscal year 1918, and to accept its bid of $1,787,784 for furnishing all the paper needed. The company's bid is said to have been the lowest submitted, but the committee rejected all bids and announced its intention to purchase in the open market.

The Joint Committee on Printing comprises Senators DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, MARCUS A. SMITH, and REED SMOOT and Representatives HENRY A. BARNHART, HARRY L. GANDY, and EDGAR R. KIESS. Justice Siddons took under consideration the application of Attorney Frank E. Elder, representing the paper company, for a rule on the committee to show cause why a mandamus should not be issued.

A similar proceeding was instituted against this committee in February, 1910, by the Valley Paper Co.

Of the personnel of the committee only Senators FLETCHER and SMOOT were then serving. Former Justice Wright issued a rule on the Senate membership of the committee after it had declined to appear on the theory that being a coordinate branch of the Government it could not be summoned before the judicial tribunal. The House Members of the committee appeared voluntarily. On a final hearing Justice Wright held that the Valley Paper Co. had not made out a case calling for a mandamus and dismissed the proceeding.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
May 26, 1917.

FRANK E. ELDER, Esq.,
Attorney Champion Coated Paper Co.,
Room 506, Bond Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Joint Committee on Printing at its meeting to-day considered your letters of April 7 and May 21, 1917, in regard to the claim of the Champion Coated Paper Co., of Hamilton, Ohio, to a vested interest in a contract for furnishing certain paper to the Public Printer under bids opened by the committee on February 17.

I have been directed by the committee to make the following reply thereto:

The joint committee is unanimously of the opinion that it has a right to reject bids under the discretionary authority vested in it by section 5 of the act of January 12, 1895 (28 Stats. L., 601), providing for the award of contracts by the committee "to the lowest and best bidder for the interest of the Government." In accordance with this provision the following paragraph was included in and made a part of the proposal subscribed to by the Champion Coated Paper Co., which thereby gave its assent to such a reservation:

"No. 3. The awards of contracts will be made by the Joint Committee on Printing to the lowest and best bidder for the interest of the Government whose bids are in conformity with the requirements of the proposal. The committee reserves the right to waive technical defects, to reject any or all bids, or to accept any bid or any part and reject the other part if, in its opinion, such action would be in the interest of the Government."

That the committee's action in rejecting the bids of the Champion Co., along with many others, was in the interest of the Government, has been fully proved by the lower prices that the Public Printer has since paid for paper bought in the open market. In fact, the Champion Co. itself has sold large quantities of paper to the Public Printer in the open market at lower prices than quoted in its proposal of February 17, as admitted by your letter of May 21. Such reductions have not been made by the Champion Co. alone, but apply to substantially all of the paper that has been purchased in the open market since March 1. The decrease in open-market prices by the Champion Co. does not, therefore, indicate any self-sacrifice on its part to serve the Government, but simply reflects the general trade condition, and justifies the committee's action in rejecting the bids of February 17. During the first two and one-half months since March 1 a saving of nearly $70,000 has been effected in the open-market purchase of paper at prices less than those proposed to the committee on February 17. At this rate, the saving for the year will approximate $350,000, which clearly demonstrates that the acceptance of the proposals submitted by the Champion and other companies on February 17 would not have been for the best interest of the Government.

The committee does not believe that the Champion or any other company is furnishing paper to the Government on open-market purchases at less than the actual cost, as asserted by you. In connection with the bids submitted to it, the committee gave consideration to a report from the Federal Trade Commission showing that the cost of producing such paper as was bid upon by the Champion Co. had increased less than 1 cent a pound, while the price was jumped by your company more than 4 cents a pound, or 100 per cent over the preceding year. With this evidence as to cost of production before it, the committee decided that it could not in justice to the Government accept the proposal of February 17 as either fair or reasonable. In fact, the bids seemed so grossly excessive and so lacking in competition as to fully warrant their rejection without again inviting proposals for contracts under the existing conditions.

The committee is surprised that a company which some time ago offered to place its entire product at the disposal of the Government in the event of war should seek to force the Government to pay excessive prices for its product now that war actually exists. This attitude is in marked contrast with the patriotic action of some other manufacturers in offering and selling their products to the Government at very substantial reductions in price in order to show their good will and "do their bit" in this tremendous struggle. The committee does not like to believe that the officers of the Champion Coated Paper Co. are any less patriotic than other manufacturers of the country, but it can not regard the demand for exorbitant prices for paper, much of which is required for military purposes, as a manifestation of patriotism or willingness to serve the Government with the same unselfish spirit as that in which this war has been entered by the American people.

Aside from all these conditions the committee seriously doubts whether it has authority to reconsider its action as proposed by your company, even if it were so disposed. You surely would not contend that the Government has an enforcible right at this late day under the proposals submitted on February 17, since the rejection of which large quantities of paper covered by those proposals have been bid for and furnished by your company in the open market without any claim to a right of contract for such paper prior to your letter of April 7. This action on the part of your company seems to foreclose the making of any such claim at this time and constitutes a complete waiver to any right of contract that may have existed. If the committee could reconsider its action and award contracts to your company on the basis of its low bids of February 17, it should take similar action with regard to all the other low bidders at that time. No such claim of a right of contract has been made by any other bidder or by the Government, though a 10-day period was provided in the proposal bond for entering into a contract in event of the acceptance of a proposal on any or all of the lots. These bonds therefore appear to have become null and void. Consequently the committee has no means of enforcing at this time any award of contracts that may now be made under the proposals of February 17, and it certainly can not be claimed that the bidder has any greater right of enforcing a contract under such proposal than has the Government. The bonds accompanying the proposals could not, of course, be held in force for an indefinite period and without such a bond, which is required by law, a proposal can not be considered by the committee, as provided for in section 5 of the printing act of 1895. Therefore it does not appear that the committee has any legal or valid proposal from the Champion Co. before it upon which an award of contracts could be made as demanded by your company.

Even if the Champion Co. had a proposal properly pending before this committee for its consideration the committee would not be intimidated into awarding a contract to your company at an excessive price by the suggestion of "mandatory proceedings against it" or an effort "to impose additional burdens upon or inconvenience to the committee or any member of it." The committee does not admit that such proceedings can lawfully be instituted against it or its members for exercising a discretion vested in it by Congress, which the committee represents in certain relations with the Government Printing Office, an institution established and operated primarily for the use and convenience of Congress.

Furthermore, the committee is not inclined to continue to regard as in good faith and for the best interest of the Government the proposals of a bidder who seeks to enforce an unjust contract on it and who at the same time persists in the delivery of paper of an inferior quality under contracts already awarded to it.

Holding this view of the matter, the committee does not believe that a conference with the vice president of the Champion Co., as proposed by you, would result in an award of contract under its proposal opened February 17, and therefore declines to enter into any such negotiations or to recognize any right of contracts, as claimed by your company.

Respectfully,

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman.

First. That the time for discussion has long since passed, and the hour for action has struck.

Second. That while deeply regretting the great sacrifice of valuable lives and the tremendous destruction of property which this war with Germany and her allies will certainly entail, we willingly and cheerfully submit to it all because we know that our cause is just, that liberty is at stake, and that civilization itself is imperiled.

Third. That we will practice economy in our home life; that we will, so far as in our power lies, increase the area of food production and conserve all our material resources; that we will be loyal in thought and temperate in speech; that we realize to the fullest extent the serious problems that have been thrust upon us for solution and must be solved; that, trying as it is, we will cheerfully furnish our quota of men and money to advance the cause of human freedom in order that when peace comes it will be concluded upon the enduring principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Fourth. That in the imperishable words of an eminent Virginian, whose steady hand is now safely guiding the destinies of this Republic, "We must all speak, act, and serve together."

His royal highness and the members of the mission will have the honor to visit the House to-morrow, Saturday, June 2, at 11.45.

Believe me, Mr. Speaker,

URGENT DEFICIENCIES FOR MILITARY AND NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is; but it explains what the conferees have done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to have the statement read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—which I do not intend to do—I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when in all probability we will get the sundry civil bill, if he has any idea as to that? There is some very important work that is being held up, involving the food question and the development of the West on a very extended scale. I would like to have some information on that so as to base on it some prospective activities.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The managers of the two Houses have been at work within five minutes of the convening of the House, and with the exception of perhaps half a dozen items that seem to promise considerable difficulty they are pretty close to an agreement. I hope to have it out of the way before the end of the week.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it is interesting, but what is it?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to have the statement read in lieu of the report?

Mr. FERRIS. I was making some inquiry about the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MANN. It was interesting, but we could not know what it was.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement.

The statement was read.

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. MANN. He can not get a vote without yielding the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes he has the floor, then.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. MANN. You can not get a vote without yielding the floor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will take it again.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to interrogate the gentleman from New York, and I ask unanimous consent to do so.

A MEMBER. Too late!

The SPEAKER. Without objection, we will consider that vote off and the gentleman can begin catechizing. [Laughter.]

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the idea, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman wish to ask me a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. The gentleman from New York, when this report was previously before the House, promised to tell us something about the new appropriation for the Council of National Defense, but was shunted off by the discussion of the emergency shipping fund. I want to know, since the appropriation for the Council of National Defense was increased from $200,000 to $500,000 additional, just what the Council of National Defense has done in the matter of making contracts? So that the gentleman may understand, I will state that it is commonly reported that the Council of National Defense may have some sort of jurisdiction over the expenditure of as high a sum as $10,000,000 000 per annum for the United States and for the allies of the United States. The bill creating the Council of National Defense defined its power and indicated that it was to appoint advisory boards, which, I believe, it has since done. Public report now says these advisory boards are making contracts. Will the gentleman explain whether the advisory boards have the power to make contracts, or make such a statement as he cares to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentleman's specific question, the subordinate committees of the advisory commission appointed by the President in accordance with the law have no authority to make any contracts and have not been making any contracts for the Government of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A bill will come up here in a very little while known as the war-risk insurance bill, which raises from $5,000,000 to an additional $50,000,000 the fund to pay war losses due to the sinking of ships and the carrying down of cargoes. That is recommended by one of these subordinate bodies of the Council of National Defense primarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not come within the purview of my activities. I have not been giving much attention to the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, and I assume that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], if he has a bill to increase the war-risk insurance fund from $5,000,000 to $50,000,000, will furnish the House with complete and satisfactory reasons for the recommendation that will be submitted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; it is taken away from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It is in the hands of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg to correct the gentleman. It was never taken away from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It has always been in the hands of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Prior to this time it was always brought in by the chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], was the author of the bill each time, but it was not considered by his committee. Any Member of the House may introduce a bill and have it referred to a committee of which he is not a member.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my regret that I should have inadvertently confused the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. I intended to state that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] would perform the service which I indicated would be performed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say to the gentleman that I appreciate the personal compliment. I only desire to keep clear and distinct the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman does not care to go into the contract question, I will ask him another question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no disinclination to furnish information upon any matter as to which I am in a position to furnish information.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand. I appreciate the gentleman's frankness.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman asked me a question, and I answered it specifically.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman did, and I am satisfied with that particular answer. But this bill gives to the Council of National Defense $500,000, whereas in the original act it was given $200,000 for its own expenses. We are told that the members of the Council of National Defense are to serve without compensation, and important business men, experts in their lines, are coming in from all sections of the country, who, it is said, will serve in an advisory capacity without pay. Now, the Council of National Defense has about it a large body of men and women, some being compensated, but the leaders are acting without compensation, according to public report. Why are we making this additional appropriation of $500,000 to a voluntary body?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the clerical services, rent, telephone, and telegraphic services, and to pay the traveling expenses of the members of the commission and other committees in coming to Washington and returning to their homes. Their services are voluntary. A large number of men engaged in various lines of industry have been selected by the advisory commission as subcommittees on various classes of material that are to be furnished for the Government. Those men are volunteering their services.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Whereas $200,000 was appropriated and $500,000 additional is now to be appropriated. Is any of that $500,000 additional to be used for salaries?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; some of it will be paid for clerical services. The provisions agreed upon by the conferees state what it is for—expenses of experimental work and investigations undertaken by the Council of National Defense. The Council of National Defense consists of six members of the Cabinet, and it may be that they may require to have conducted either experiments or investigations relative to the materials to be acquired on account of the war. They wish to be in a position to employ the proper services to make such investigations or experiments. And then for the employment of experts, if necessary, regarding any particular material or commodity. Then for clerical and other services at the rates of compensation provided in section 167 of the Revised Statutes, which fixes the compensation of the clerks in the various classes—messengers and other similar employees. Then for books of reference, supplies in the nature of stationery and office equipment, and expenses of the men going to and from their employment. Some of the members of the advisory commission have been in Washington several months, have paid their own expenses, have served without compensation, and they are paying the rent of the offices they occupy, as there were no offices available for them in which to perform their work, the amount authorized for the expenditure for rent was limited to $5,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer this question? Does the gentleman know whether any aliens are employed by the Council of National Defense or any of its branches who will receive compensation out of the $500,000 plus the $200,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information that aliens have been compensated out of that fund.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been reported that the gentleman who is to be the food director of the United States has brought his English staff with him. It may be a good thing or it may not, but I think the Congress ought to be advised whether an alien staff brought into the country to do the work of the allies or of the United States is to be compensated out of an appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not believe an appropriation for the Council of National Defense would be available for work done by Mr. Hoover. If any work is being done by him now for which there is any expense it would in all probability be paid for out of the $100,000,000 placed at the President's disposal to take care of unanticipated emergencies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, the gentleman has no knowledge of alien employees being compensated out of this fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask whether these Council of National Defense employees come under the civil service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that they are all in the civil service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Council of National Defense ask for them in the regular way under the civil-service regulations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did not request that they should be appointed without regard to the civil-service regulations, and under the law the classes of employees indicated, with the exception perhaps of experts, have all by Executive order prior to this time been included in the classified service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there anything to prevent the employment of these persons in an emergency and then afterwards have them covered into the service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My opinion is that there is no authority for the employment of these clerks, telephone operators, and so forth, except through the classified service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask if it is in order at this time to make a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. A motion to recommit will be in order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to recommit the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But, Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the Committee on Appropriations been able to find out from investigation whether the Council of National Defense has control of the purchase of supplies for the Army and the Navy, and whether they have the power to let contracts for the construction of buildings and the purchase of equipment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That matter was gone into quite thoroughly. There is a confusion in the minds of gentlemen in speaking about the Council of National Defense. The Council of National Defense consists of six members of the Cabinet, the chairman of which is the Secretary of War. The advisory commission consists of seven persons appointed by the President on the nomination of the Council of National Defense. The information furnished to the Committee on Appropriations is that the advisory commission and the subordinate committees organized——

Mr. MADDEN. Subordinate to the advisory commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; have only advisory powers. They have no power to make a contract for any purpose. What they have attempted to do is to ascertain the available supplies of various materials required either for the Army or the Navy, to ascertain what would be a reasonable price, to ascertain the possibilities of transportation facilities for the materials from any particular point to any designated point, and to collate information which would be of use to the various departments and to furnish it to them.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they any directory powers over the heads of departments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have none, according to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they exercising any directory power notwithstanding they have none?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information is that the various departments have the final and complete determination regarding the making of the contracts. What has happened has been that an immense volume of purchases have unexpectedly and unanticipatedly been precipitated on the Government. A volume of equipment and commodities to an extraordinary extent are required by the Government, and at this time they are required in a very short time. The Government requires about 2,000,000,000 feet of lumber. The statement has been made that it will take 90,000 men employed about 60 days to complete the cantonments required for the troops to be assembled. It is such an extraordinary situation, arising somewhat precipitately, without the great, comprehensive organization that would be required for the handling of bids on such a tremendous scale, that there has been some confusion and difficulty in working out the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. Are contracts being let by advertising for bids?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there is a law that provides that in an emergency or in a time of war the provisions of the Revised Statutes regarding the invitation for proposals in competitive bids may be suspended, and an order has been issued that such an emergency exists, and contracts are being let in most instances—I am not certain as to all—without competitive bids.

Mr. MADDEN. Are they letting contracts for the construction of buildings, and purchasing supplies on a basis of a percentage of profit on the total cost of the work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The contracts thus far for the construction of cantonments have been of a tentative nature. The form of the contract has not been determined upon, but contracts have been let on an agreement that the contractor will accept the contract and conditions finally determined upon by the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. On the basis of a percentage upon the total cost?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That has not been settled.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know whether there is any truth in the statement that I have heard—a statement made upon reliable authority—to this effect: That the contractor who built the cantonments at Atlanta, Ga., for example, had worked upon the basis of a 10 per cent profit upon the total cost; that he went to Atlanta where carpenters were getting $3.25 a day and employed all carpenters at $7.50 a day; that he went to the lumber yards and purchased all of the lumber that was being sold at $37.50 a thousand at $60 a thousand, and so on? Is there any information in the possession of the committee to the effect that such things as that have been done?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, that matter was brought to the attention of the committee, and it was submitted to the Secretary of War, and we had printed in the hearings had in connection with the Council of National Defense a communication from the Secretary of War, which I shall have the Clerk read.

Mr. MADDEN. I am quite sure the Secretary of War would not submit to anything of that sort.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall have the statement read to show just what the situation is, because these contracts were made in the War Department.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it would be a real service to the Secretary of War to have such things as that exposed, if he does not know about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I send the communication to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It was brought to my attention some days ago that a Member of Congress had been informed that in the building of cantonments at Fort McPherson a contract had been let for a price which was to be determined by the cost of material and labor plus a percentage of profit to the contractor; that thereupon the contractor had bought lumber at $60 per thousand feet, cord measure, which was then selling in the mill at $40 per thousand feet, and had employed labor at the rate of $7 per diem, while the current rate for labor in that market was $4 per diem, the obvious implication being that these excessive prices for material and labor were paid by the contractor in order to increase his profits, which would be based upon a percentage of the aggregate cost.

I at once inquired of the Quartermaster General with regard to this incident and was informed that all contracts for construction work at Fort McPherson had been let through the Southern Department and that as yet no record had been forwarded to the War Department. I then directed inquiry be made at the Southern Department, and have to-day received a telegram as follows:

"Reference your wire 19th. Prices of lumber when contract was made to build cantonments ran from $17 to $30 per thousand, according to grades and size, which price was paid. All low-grade lumber in local market was exhausted before any of higher grades was purchased. All prices have advanced several dollars per thousand. Carpenters were paid 40 cents per hour, which is the local rate for first-class carpenters."

This telegram is from the commanding officer at Fort McPherson. It clearly shows that proper prices and proper economies were used in this contract.

I have no doubt that the Member of Congress to whom this story was brought was imposed upon by some rumor circulated by persons without information as to the facts.

NEWTON D. BAKER.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the Secretary of War has gone into that question and cleared it up, for I am sure that he would not under any circumstances be a party to that. Another question that I desire to clear up is whether the Council of National Defense has any power to make purchases for the War Department or for the Navy Department or for any other department without the consent or knowledge of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of any other department. I ask that question for this reason, and I shall be frank about it: I have understood that one man who manufactures cots, and who has manufactured cots for the Army and Navy for years, who has had no contract with the Government, but who has always sold his cots through jobbers who have always bid for the work, went to the Council of National Defense and offered to supply the Government with all of the cots it needed at the price that he sold them to the jobbers, and thereby do his share toward minimizing the cost of the war—in other words, to do away with the jobbers' profit and give the Government of the United States the advantage of the cots at cost. I have been informed that when the offer was made somebody connected with the Council of National Defense—not any person connected with the War Department or the Navy Department, but the Council of National Defense—refused it, and that they continued to direct the purchase of the cots to be used by the Army at the price at which the jobbers sell them, and not the price at which the manufacturer was willing to sell them. Has the Committee on Appropriations any information along that line that it is willing to give to the House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the committee investigated the question of cots and had printed a complete statement about them. I believe, in justice to all concerned, a statement should be made. The members of the advisory committee of the Council of National Defense have been doing a work of very great value to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree to that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information that has been furnished to the committee discloses that already they have saved the Government a very considerable sum of money. In the emergency that arose some things have happened that can be criticized, but the number of those instances is practically insignificant in comparison with the great volume of things that have been done. I believe this cot matter is one that is subject to criticism and perhaps was the result of a policy that should not have been adopted. It may be that it grew out of a misapprehension on the part of some officials in the War Department as to just what the powers of those subordinate bodies and the advisory committee were to be. There was a misapprehension at the outset that those bodies were to determine the types, prices, and persons to whom contracts were to be let. When that was called to the attention of the Secretary of War he cleared up that situation. The cot situation grew out of a certain peculiar combination of circumstances. For instance, to house in tents an army of a million men will require about 19,000,000 yards of cotton ducking.

The yearly output of cotton ducking in the United States is only 16,000,000 yards. In addition to the amount of cotton ducking that would be required for tents great quantities are required for cots and for various purposes in both the Army and the Navy; and one of the problems to be worked out is illustrated here—the necessity for ascertaining what other material might be substituted, or how the entire industry would not be demoralized or other industries demoralized by the United States taking the entire output of any one particular commodity. Suggestions were therefore made that perhaps a steel cot could be utilized. Those cots must be ready when the men are assembled at the various cantonments. I speak with some hesitation about the cot business, because I may not be unbiased. The information that came to me came in an attempt to help a constituent, but I shall try to state frankly and impartially what the facts are. A constituent of mine came here representing a concern that had been in the business of furnishing cots to certain persons who had from time to time bid to supply cots to the Army and Navy. He heard that a great number of cots were to be bought, and he was anxious to get a contract for a large number of them. I first telephoned to the Quartermaster General on the 14th of May, and was informed by him that the War Department had nothing to do with the making of contracts for cots; that that had been turned over to the advisory commission. On the 16th of May I had this constituent go to the advisory commission, and he was directed to a man who had charge of cots. He was informed that the committee was attempting to ascertain what could be done regarding cots; that specifications had been sent out on the 14th of May to the various manufacturers asking them to state the price at which they could furnish cots, the number they could furnish, and stating that time and speedy delivery was an important factor.

Later in the day I called myself with this gentleman upon a member of the advisory commission who had charge of this particular division in which cots came, and he stated that the information was in the possession of the gentleman who was seen first in the day. Subsequently as the result of certain developments the members of the committee in charge of cots appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and these facts were developed: At some time in May, prior, at least, to the 10th of May, the president of the Simmons Manufacturing Co., of Kenosha, Wis., manufacturers of cots, came to Washington and submitted specifications for a steel cot which he said he could manufacture. The specifications fitted peculiarly the plant that he maintained at Kenosha, Wis. On the 10th of May his representative, upon the letterhead of the Willard Hotel, wrote a letter to the Quartermaster General stating that pursuant to previous conferences he was offering to furnish the entire output of the factory, which then had a capacity of 2,500 daily and could be expanded to 5,000 daily, steel cots, in conformity with the specifications submitted at cost plus 10 per cent, which was equivalent to $3.10 a cot f. o. b. Kenosha, Wis. On the 11th of May a representative of the Quartermaster Department wrote to the advisory committee, directing them to make a contract with the Simmons Manufacturing Co. at a flat rate of $3.10 for as many cots as it was believed would be substituted for the cotton duck and wooden cots previously in use in the Army.

Some time about the 11th day of May an order was given to the Simmons Manufacturing Co. for 300,000 cots, at $3.10 apiece f. o. b., and 25,000 cots, at $3.10 f. o. b. San Francisco, where the concern had another plant. It was then determined 500,000 steel cots should be obtained. Three days later, or on the 14th of May, the specifications were sent out to all the other cot manufacturers in the United States, asking whether they could furnish these cots, asking what their capacity was, and what time they could be delivered in. Two days after that letter was sent out and five days after the Quartermaster General had directed the committee to make this contract I was informed that nothing had been determined upon either as to price, type, or contract. I simply wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that to have one manufacturer have advance information as to the number of any articles desired, to be permitted to prepare his own specifications, to be given a contract at a price named by him, without any inquiries as to whether anyone else with the same information and the same opportunity could meet or better that price, is not, from my viewpoint, the manner in which the business of the United States or a private individual should be conducted.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to ask the gentleman at that point, in fairness to the Committee on National Defense, without commenting on the wisdom of their action, did it not turn out that they had changed the specifications so that the cot could be bid upon by any manufacturer who made a woven-wire cot?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The specifications were modified, it was stated, so that others could bid.

Mr. MADDEN. But this man had advance information under which he took the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Before the specifications were sent out to the other contractors to ascertain what they could do it was stated some changes had been made in them that would not make them exclusively applicable to the Simmons Manufacturing Co., but before that was done 300,000 of the 500,000, or 325,000, had been ordered from the Simmons Co., a million-dollar contract.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman or the Committee on Appropriations know the difference in the weight of an ordinary canvas cot with a wooden frame and a steel cot, and the difference in the cost of transportation along with the difference in the price?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think from what appeared before the committee a situation had arisen where it was necessary to substitute some steel cots for the cotton and wooden cots.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the average price for the wooden and canvas cot, the combination of wood and canvas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not recall.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no canvas connected with the steel cot, is there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is not.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact the Government used to pay between four and five dollars for the cots that they now purchase at $3.10?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know the previous price.

Mr. SABATH. I glanced over this hearing, and I think we paid between four and five dollars formerly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Cots bought in lots of 1,000 or 300,000 would command a very considerably different price.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman from New York any information as to the difference in price of canvas and steel cots?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it was stated, I do not recall.

Mr. MADDEN. How much more canvas is there in a wooden canvas cot than in a steel canvas cot?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no canvas in the steel cot. There is canvas in the wooden cot.

Mr. SHERLEY. Touching the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois, in the freight proposition there is a difference of 20 cents. Mr. Cloney was asked:

> Is not the difference in the price of a canvas cot and of a steel cot made up in the weight and the saving in transportation? Is not that difference in price made up to the Government in that way?
> Mr. CLONEY. No.
> Mr. HOWARD. It is not?
> Mr. CLONEY. No, sir. Probably 20 cents would be a high average for the freight on any kind of a steel cot to any probable point.

Mr. MONDELL. Does that give the cost of the canvas cot?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was stated that the cheapest canvas cot that could have been built in the last two years has been $3.52, and the cheapest steel cot—that is, the lowest bid they have had on a steel cot—is $3.10.

Mr. MADDEN. Who is letting the contract for these cots? It was not let by the Quartermaster General, was it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it was. It was decided on by the advisory committee.

Mr. MADDEN. He simply did the clerical work in connection with it?

Mr. FITZFERALD. That may be.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the power exist in any committee of the Council of National Defense to direct the Quartermaster General or the general in charge of the Ordnance Department, or any of these departments, to let contracts without bids?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have no power to let contracts to anyone. Their work is purely advisory. There was a misapprehension on the part of the Quartermaster General as to the power of the committees. The Secretary has issued an order which I believe remedies any question——

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any truth in the rumor that any person or any committee of the advisory council of the Council of National Defense refuses to accept the manufacturer's price on cots and continues to buy the cots from jobbers with the profits of the jobbers added?

Mr. FITZGERALD. So far as the committee has any information, I think the advisory commission in all instances has been endeavoring to eliminate the jobber in all lines and to have business done directly with the manufacturer or producer.

Mr. MADDEN. They are not in a position where they can embarrass the Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy or any other heads of departments, are they, by directing things to be done contrary to the wishes of the department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. Their power is purely advisory. I think it is but fair to those men to say that complaints will be inevitable, and that some things may be done the wisdom of which will be questioned. But they have rendered services of a highly valuable character to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. They will do that, of course. They are men of great ability.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is inevitable that some complaints will arise.

Mr. MADDEN. It is just as well to keep before the public mind any irregularities, if any such there be, so that we can have them understand that the Congress of the United States is watching the proceedings of the Council of National Defense and expects of it not only the patriotic motives which they profess but the patriotic efforts which they have the power to give to the Government and the adoption of business policies which will not cost the Government more than it should pay, but which will save money for the Government, as men of their brains and ability have the power to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be said that a number of those men have been conscripted or requisitioned. They have been successful in various lines of business, and they are not very familiar with the methods of Government. In many instances it has been very difficult for them to ascertain just what is expected of them.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I understand there is a law requiring all contracts to be let after bids are received, with the power on the part of the President, I believe, to suspend them. Do I understand now, as a matter of fact, the President at the request of the Council of National Defense has suspended the law requiring the different departments to advertise for bids or to receive bids before they let any contracts, and that they have adopted the policy of letting the Council of National Defense select whom it pleases to let a contract to, and that the Council of National Defense then furnishes to the different departments the name of the contractor and the substance of the contract, and that the contract is entered into without obtaining competitive bids?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The national defense act, section 120, provides:

> The President, in time of war or when war is imminent, is empowered, through the head of any department of the Government, in addition to the present authorized methods of purchase or procurement, to place an order with any individual, firm, association, company, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry, for such product or material as may be required, and which is of the nature and kind usually produced or capable of being produced by such individual, firm, company, association, corporation, or organized manufacturing industry.

Mr. MANN. I am familiar with the law. I referred to it. What I want to know is whether the President at the request of the Council of National Defense has abolished in effect the law in reference to obtaining bids?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not state at whose instance such an order was issued, but I have been informed that an order has been issued providing for the purchase of supplies for the Army without competitive bids.

Mr. MANN. And that extends also to letting contracts for work done, does it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I mean for work and the purchase of supplies without competitive bidding.

Mr. MANN. That suspension of the usual law is not confined, as I understand, to the purchase of matériel for the Army, being ammunition or other supplies?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has reference to the expenditure of money for supplies and work in connection with these cantonments. I have that information as to the Army, but I have no information about any other department.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I think the statement should be qualified somewhat. I do not think it is the policy or the desire of the departments or of the advisory commission to dispense with competitive bidding everywhere and always, but at this present time, in the doing of certain classes of work, time was the essence of the matter, and was more important than any other factor. They undertook to ascertain, through these various committees, the amount of material of various kinds that could be furnished, and at what prices they were willing to furnish them, in many instances those prices being considerably under the market price. I think it has been true that, in regard to cantonments, they have taken certain contractors who they believed were prepared to do the work within the time necessary—that work really means the building of camps that in the aggregate constitutes a city larger than the city of Washington, so that the job is a gigantic one—and that these contractors have then been advised of the material that various people were prepared to furnish and the maximum price—not the minimum price, but the maximum price—that they had offered to furnish it at. The contractors then have gone to these men and frequently have invited bids; but I do not understand that it is the purpose, where the capacity of the country is very much greater than the quantity needed and time permits, to undertake to arbitrarily pick out Jones, Smith, or Brown to furnish the material. But in such instances it will be left, as it has been in the past, to competitive bidding.

Mr. MANN. I was told, for instance—I do not give the Secretary of War the chance of explaining or denying it—that they would let a contract to one man, who is not a contractor in the business, to construct all the roads in those encampments. I do not know who devised the word for us of "cantonments."

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no information on that. But while I am on my feet, if the gentleman will yield to me further, I think this is what we are going to need and should come to—it is a matter that will require further action and consideration by Congress—it is desirable that there should be created a body, small in size, composed of men who are officers of the Government—I do not mean necessarily existing officers, but that those who are appointed on it shall be made officers of the Government. This body should supervise and control all of the letting of these contracts, hear complaints, and be practically an appeal body.

Now, the theory of the law that created the National Defense Commission was that the National Defense Board, composed of six Cabinet officers, should be that sort of a body, but it is perfectly apparent to anybody who has looked into it that they can not perform that function and perform their other functions as members of the Cabinet, and that if they are really to perform the functions that have been placed upon them as members of the board they will have to neglect their functions as heads of their respective departments.

Mr. MANN. Well, we all knew that when the bill was passed. That is the reason why I was opposed to the item.

Mr. SHERLEY. That may be; but we are now face to face with a situation——

Mr. MANN. We are now faced with this situation: The law contemplated that the President should have the power in certain cases to suspend the operation of the law that required competitive bidding, but, at the instance of the Council of National Defense, he has suspended it generally as to a very large class of cases; and everyone here knows that if that law requiring competitive bidding were suspended and contracts are let favoritism will creep in, and corruption is inevitable, no matter who has charge of it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think every man appreciates that danger; but another fact must be borne in mind, that in waiving competitive bidding at this time it has been done because of the absolute necessity of getting certain work done immediately.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; competitive bidding can still be had without even advertising. But to let contracts simply to one man without even asking—and I do not know whether that has been done, although I am told it has been done—is outrageous and ought not to be permitted.

Mr. SHERLEY. If it was done it was done in such a situation: Take the cot situation—and I agree that the practice followed there was subject to censure—but the very fact that the contract was let to the Simmons people for a certain number of cots was because they were the only people in this country that could furnish them in that quantity and at a price less than the price paid heretofore. Now, I do not mean by that that should be the usual policy. I do not think it should be. But I do think that when it was done it was done because of what these men believed to be a compelling reason as to time and exigency.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Inasmuch as time is exceedingly important, does it not strike the gentleman as remarkable that so large a contract should be given to one firm—a firm that might fall down and not be able to fulfill the contract?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think that follows at all. I believe if a firm has the power to perform a contract in a given time it would be better to award the contract to that firm than to undertake to parcel it out to little firms that might fall down on the little contracts.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is remarkable that such a chance should have been taken.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky think that there is a growing need for a joint committee of Congress on the conduct of the war?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; I do not think anything so unfortunate could be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to ask the gentleman with regard to amendment No. 36, to which the House conferees have agreed. It provides for civilian military training. I wish to inquire whether the purpose of that paragraph is something new or whether it provides for the training of reserve officers? As I scope the purpose of the paragraph, it is to provide for the training of civilians outside of the preparation of them for officers in the reserves.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the conduct of the camps that are established for the training of citizens for commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is intended to train civilians for officers' commissions?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. They enlist and go to the camps with the understanding that they will be commissioned if they pass the examination, or be discharged if they do not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then those men are to receive, under another item of the bill, $100 a month from the time they enter the camp?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One hundred dollars a month. This is not available for compensation, but is for all the expenses incident to conducting the camp, and it is about one-half the required amount. The Army bill carries over $3,000,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire also as to amendment No. 12, providing more than $2,000,000 for the fees of registers in connection with the conscription law. Has the gentleman any information as to what fees are to be paid to the various officials for carrying out the conscription law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We were unable to obtain any accurate information as to the compensation to be paid to the State, county, and municipal officers for this work. When the bill was before the House no provision had been made to compensate them, or to provide the expense of registration and draft. The Judge Advocate General estimated that it would cost approximately so much a man, and this sum was requested. They were unable to give any definite information, except that there will be a very considerable expense. The registration is to take place next Tuesday and the draft within a short time, and we had to give them ample funds.

Mr. STAFFORD. The registers are already at work in various localities throughout the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I understand so, and provision had to be made. We could not tell just what the expense would be.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I should like to inquire regarding amendments 26 and 27, about which I asked the chairman of the committee a question or two the other day. I note that the conferees have agreed to $500,000 for recreational and educational purposes at training and mobilization camps. They have, however, put in a proviso that no part of the sum shall be expended for personal services. Now, from a cursory observation it seems to me that is an unfortunate provision, because it may prevent some services being rendered which are most necessary for these recreational and educational purposes at libraries, schools, gymnasiums, and so forth. I should like to ask what induced the conferees to put in that proviso?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Several things. The first was the desire not to have all the money eaten up by a lot of idealists who would have imaginary notions as to how to entertain the soldiers. Second, it was reported that plans were being prepared to employ most of the actors and actresses who will be out of employment during the summer and put them on a circuit, going from one camp to another. We provide recreation rooms and moving-picture shows and different things at present in the Army, and the necessary service is attended to by details of men, and it has worked out satisfactorily. The managers of the two Houses were anxious to give ample funds to provide proper recreational facilities, gymnasiums and reading rooms, and lunch and amusement rooms, and matters of such character, but did not wish a great army of employees fastened on this appropriation to defeat the object intended by it.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman not think that proviso will interfere with the service that is desired, or with the efficiency of this work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think it should. There was no information furnished by the War Department relative to the matter. The item was put in on the floor of the Senate, on the statement of some Senator, and after the matter was discussed pretty carefully the managers agreed upon that limitation, the belief being that this would furnish what was desired and what was essential for the men.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I am sure we all desire the same thing, Mr. Speaker. The only point is whether this additional provision may hinder the very purpose for which the appropriation is intended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. I do not believe Congress intends to hire a lot of shows.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that my time may be extended.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question in reference to amendment 14?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. We have agreed to that amendment, under the pay of enlisted men in the Army, which provides for paying $100 a month to enlisted men in training for officers of the Reserve Corps. What was the purpose of putting that in here?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to pay the men who are being trained for commissions in these camps.

Mr. MANN. They are not enlisted men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; they enlist them with the understanding that if they qualify they will be commissioned, and if not they will be discharged.

Mr. MANN. If it is put in for that purpose, why did you not use the same language that is in the current law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the Army appropriation act?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We endeavored to do that, but could not.

Mr. MANN. You missed it by a wide guess.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say we endeavored to conform to the provisions of the Army act, but the Senate insisted on this language.

Mr. MANN. We carried in the Army appropriation law the item that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized out of this appropriation—that is, the civilian military training appropriation—to pay to persons designated by him for training as officers in the Army during the period of their training the sum of not to exceed $100 per month in addition to the allowances authorized by section 54. This makes an appropriation which will be carried in a different item on the books and provides possibly a different rate of pay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a deficiency, and it was stated that it would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says this is a deficiency; this runs through the same time the Army appropriation bill runs.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My opinion is that it should have been put in the same form as the language in the Army bill.

Mr. MANN. My opinion is that the conferees did not know that there was any such item in the Army bill or they would have put it in that form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken, the provision in the Army bill is in the form of a proviso.

Mr. MANN. That is no information; I have just read it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question was discussed and still the Senate insisted on this particular form. There is a point, as the gentleman knows, when the argument with Senators reaches the quitting point.

Mr. MANN. I am glad it is in so as to make a sufficient sum of money to pay them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. This declares that it shall be $100 a month, while the House bill declared that it might be.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The War Department has determined that the pay shall be $100 a month.

Mr. MANN. Are all these men enlisted men?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understand that they are.

Mr. MANN. Under what authority can they enlist a man over a certain age?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They do not take anybody in these camps above a certain age.

Mr. MANN. What is that age?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Thirty-five years.

Mr. MANN. Is there not anybody in these camps over the age of 35 years?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They would not be enlisted. They might take them in under some provision.

Mr. MANN. That is what I want to know, whether they are all enlisted or not. The difficulty is to know not so much what is the law but whether anybody is paying any attention to the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I would not undertake to volunteer that information.

Mr. MANN. It is something that we are entitled to know. The gentleman from New York knows perfectly well that there are a lot of people there over age for the Army.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that, on reflection, I have been informed by The Adjutant General that they have some men who are above the age of enlistment, but whether they are enlisted or not I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they are enlisted or not, but I know the conferees have stated that they were all enlisted, and that is the sort of dope we are furnished.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that it is necessary for the Council for National Defense to keep on growing with the same speed that it has grown for the last year? Not to criticize, but its growth and expansion has been abnormal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The advisory commission is authorized to organize subordinate boards, and it may be that it may. They anticipate an enlargement of their activities very much.

Mr. FERRIS. How much of the Government funds can they now spend during the fiscal year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill carries $500,000, and there is an additional appropriation of $200,000, which makes $700,000. They have saved on copper and steel and some other materials at least $10,000,000. The testimony shows that.

Mr. FERRIS. I am glad to know that is true, but I should think the amount alleged to have been saved must be largely problematical.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no question about it. Copper is selling at about 38 cents, and all the Government pays under its contracts is 16 or 18 cents. All that information is in the testimony.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is the gentleman from New York satisfied with the reduction of the appropriation for horses? It is a very large reduction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The War Department said that it was all it needed.

Mr. FERRIS. How much does the bill carry for the purchase of land for cantonments, and so forth?

Mr. FITZGERALD. None for the purchase of cantonment sites. Some for the purchase of aviation sites and some for the purchase of other land that has not been agreed on. I can not state offhand the total.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to say that I think these items for the purchase of land ought to be looked into very carefully by the committee of the House. We have been abolishing forts, giving away land, and leaving land unused.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, we folks in the back part of the meeting are entitled to know what is going on in the fore part of the meeting. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I will restate my question. I have just asked the gentleman from New York how much was being expended or appropriated for land for cantonment sites, naval sites, and aeroplane sites, and so forth. I ask for information without any idea of criticism. I then said I thought very close attention ought to be given to the appropriations asked for the purchase of land. We have spent considerable time in the last 10 years abandoning forts and giving away military reservations that belong to the Government. We have many forts and military reservations not now in use, and it is just a word of caution in time. I doubt if the War Department or the Navy Department will ultimately be upheld if it develops they are buying large areas of land when they have large areas equally as good and equally as available.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Out of the $3,300,000,000, about $3,000,000 is available for the purchase of land.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman let me answer one interrogation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. As far as the sites for cantonments are concerned, it is a purely temporary lease, all of them. They are all predicated on leases on a three-year basis. Practically all the aviation projects have this clause in them—and I have some knowledge of that—they are leased on a three-year basis, 640 acres, and then within three years, if Congress should make any of these permanent, they take an option on the purchase of the 640 acres.

Mr. FERRIS. I have made some investigation of this matter also. I know the Government is put to severe tests these days. Everyone ought to be helpful; but there is no one way in which we can help so well as to point out errors or pitfalls before we fall into them—not afterwards.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I notice the gentleman has agreed on $500,000 for recreation in this bill. I congratulate the committee upon arriving at that conclusion, but I see that it is provided that none of it shall be paid for personal services or salaries. May I ask if that is satisfactory to the War Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know; I have not inquired.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman think that they can expend that much for recreation of the soldiers without some person being hired to assist in the recreation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. The War Department furnished no information to the House of Representatives on the subject whatever.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was interested in the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that under this he thinks that sooner or later we must have a small body of experts to pass on these general contracts. Is it the judgment of the committee that the advisory members of the Council of National Defense are such a body?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was expressing his own views. He was not speaking of any matter that had been determined by the committee.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. There are seven advisory members, are there not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is it the opinion of the committee that that body ought to be enlarged in numbers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee has not considered the question. The gentleman from Kentucky was expressing his own views. It is a matter that has not been considered by the committee. In fact, we have not jurisdiction over it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman stated that the House of Representatives had no information in regard to the $500,000 appropriated in this bill for the purposes of recreation. Why did the committee agree to it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. From information furnished to the committee by the managers on the part of the Senate. I said the War Department had furnished the House no information upon it.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Has it furnished the Senate any information?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. We are to have a million men in the field, and if we can keep them happy and in good humor for this amount of money it is cheap at the price.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I now offer a motion to recommit with instructions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BANKHEAD moves that the bill be recommitted to the committee on conference, and that the conferees on the part of the House be, and are hereby, instructed to insist on the following amendment:

On line 24, page 39, after the word "fund," insert the following language:

"Provided further, That no part of the money hereinbefore appropriated for the regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps; incidental supplies, Quartermaster Corps; transportation of the Army and its supplies; water and sewers at military posts; clothing and camp and garrison equipage; horses for Cavalry, Artillery, and Engineers; barracks and quarters; military-post exchanges and roads, wharves, and drainage shall be paid to any person, firm, agency, association, or corporation having any individual, member, representative, agent, or officer on any subordinate body or any committee of the National Council of Defense at the time the articles or supplies provided for in the sums so appropriated are purchased or contracted for, except such articles or supplies already bought or contracted for prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no amendment at the point indicated and nothing in controversy between the Houses, and the gentleman can not instruct the managers to do something that would violate the rules of the House. The managers could not incorporate in this bill new matter at a point where there is nothing in controversy and no amendment of any character pending. The gentleman is instructing the managers to insist upon incorporating into this bill something that is not in controversy at a point where there is no modification or change.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman refers to the page and line. Does the gentleman refer in that to the House print with the Senate amendments numbered?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; House bill 3971 with Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. If it is the gentleman's intention to have it come in at the bottom of this particular page, then there is no amendment there which is in controversy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the motion is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that if the committee of conference had incorporated that provision in this conference report, it would have made the conference report subject to the point of order itself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I am not an expert upon the interpretation of the rules of the House, but in conference with some gentlemen on the floor, in whose judgment I have confidence, I was advised that this motion would be in order. Of course I apprehend the situation to be, and it is true, that there is no difference between the two Houses upon this particular proposition, but I was under the impression that the House, while the legislation was still under its control, under the rules of the House would have the right to give instructions with reference to the ways and means by which the appropriation should be expended, and putting certain restrictions and regulations upon such expenditures.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, I think, knows that things in conference are Senate amendments, which the Senate has insisted upon and which the House has disagreed to. Nothing else is in conference. If this bill goes back to the Senate, the Senate would have no right to inject an amendment at some place in the bill where it had no amendment before, and the mere fact that the bill is before the House at this time, having been agreed to by the Senate, does not authorize the House to change the text of the bill, which has been agreed to by both bodies.

The SPEAKER. That is undoubtedly true. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon its amendment to Senate amendment No. 2 and upon its disagreement to the other Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House do further insist upon its amendment to Senate amendment No. 2 and insist upon its disagreement to the other Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. GILLETT.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon the House by special order made Senate bill 2133, the war-risk insurance bill, in order for this morning, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can not call the bill up in that way. He has to move to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose so, if the gentleman objects. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2133) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, and pending that I desire to see if I can make some agreement with the other side with respect to general debate.

Mr. Speaker, pending that I will ask the other side, as the gentleman from Wisconsin is present, about limiting debate.

Mr. MANN. I hope we can get through the bill to-day, but I do not think we can agree now about the length of debate.

Mr. ESCH. I will state to the gentleman I have had two requests for time.

Mr. MANN. I have had several requests for time.

Mr. ADAMSON. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I think we had better go on with debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. And make no agreement now?

Mr. MANN. If necessary we can rise after a while and limit debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on resolving the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2133.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2133, with Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2133, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2133) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], the author of the bill, to explain the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration by the committee—S. 2133—is practically the same in its terms as the bill H. R. 4050, and is a bill "To amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes."

It may be well at this time to give a brief summary of the provisions of the existing law to those who are not familiar with the terms of existing law, and then indicate the amendments proposed in the bill now under consideration by the committee. Shortly after the war in Europe began it was evident that it would be necessary for our Government to write war-risk insurance on our vessels under the American flag engaged in foreign trade. On September 2, 1914, the existing war-risk insurance act became a law. It provides for the establishment in the Treasury Department of a bureau to be known as the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, and for the appointment of a director at a salary of $5,000 a year. It provides that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their fright and passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war whenever it should appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

The bureau is authorized, under existing law, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to adopt and publish a form of war-risk policy and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys and cargoes, against war risks, the rates to be subject to such change, to each port and for each class, as the Secretary shall find may be required by the circumstances. The law when passed provided that the proceeds of the premiums should be covered into the Treasury of the United States. The board is given power under the existing law to make reasonable rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of the act, and it also provides that an advisory board of three members might be appointed, skilled in the practices of war-risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in fixing rates of premiums and in adjustment of claims for losses, and generally in carrying out the purposes of the act. The compensation of this advisory board was fixed at not to exceed $25 per day for time actually employed in the service of the board. The Director of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, in the adjustment of any claims for losses in respect of which no action shall have been begun, should, on approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, promptly pay such claim for losses to the party in interest, and provision is made for the speedy adjustment and payment of claims. For the purposes of paying losses accruing under the provisions of the act the sum of $5,000,000 was appropriated and an additional sum of $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, including the payment of salaries authorized and other personal services in the District of Columbia.

The act provides that the President may, whenever in his judgment the necessity of further war insurance by the United States shall have ceased to exist, suspend the operations of the act so far as it authorizes insurance by the United States against loss or damage by risks of war; the suspension in any event to be made within two years after the passage of the act—of course, not to affect any insurance then outstanding. For the purpose of the final adjustment of any such outstanding insurance or claim the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, in the discretion of the President, might have been continued in existence for a further period not exceeding one year. The operations of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, so far as it authorized the board to write war-risk insurance, would have terminated two years after September 2, 1914.

On August 11, 1916, a bill which I had introduced was passed and became a law, extending the life of this bureau for another year, also contained a provision that all moneys received from premiums and from salvage should be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation made for the payment of losses.

On March 3, just before the adjournment of the Sixty-fourth Congress, another act was passed continuing the life of this bureau another year and increasing the appropriation to pay losses, from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000. Mr. Chairman, we should keep in mind that I have been speaking of the provisions of the existing law creating the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance. The losses up to and including May 2, 1917, have been $5,903,589.10.

I will insert in the RECORD a list of the vessels and the amount of loss on each, also the cargoes and the amount of loss.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. COX. How does the balance stand now in the Treasury Department with reference to the amount of claims that have been paid out and the amount of premiums collected?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will get to that in just a moment.

Mr. COX. All right.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman just stated what the total loss was, but I did not catch it. I wish he would repeat it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I said it was $5,903,589.10.

From the time the bureau was created, September 2, 1914, until the 1st of January, 1917, 1,791 policies were issued, $3,244,785.04 in premiums were collected, and the total losses were about $800,000, leaving a net balance of premiums collected, over and above the losses paid, in the neighborhood of over $8,500,000. I will put the exact figures in the RECORD. Since the 1st of January the losses have increased very rapidly, and the number of policies issued have also increased.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would prefer to make a continuous statement.

Mr. HAWLEY. I just wanted to know what the total amount of insurance was upon which those premiums were collected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will give you that in just a moment.

From September 2, 1914, to January 1, 1917, the amount insured was $182,203,080, and, as stated heretofore, the premiums collected were $3,244,785.04. Now, the number of policies from January 1, 1917, to May 23, 1917, was 2,793 as against 1,791 for the entire period from September 2, 1914, to January 1, 1917, showing a very marked increase. There was a total of policies issued from September 2, 1914, to May 23, 1917, of 4,584. The total amount insured was $504,003,016. The premiums collected were $10,300,355.20. The known losses were approximately about $6,000,000, leaving something over $4,300,000 in premiums collected in excess of losses up to May 24, 1917. The amount of the expenses of the bureau, including salaries, from September 2, 1914, to April 30, 1917, was $52,447.63. The original amount appropriated to pay expenses was $100,000, showing, I think, that the expenses of this bureau have been very small and that the work of the bureau has been economically performed. As far as I know, there never has been any criticism whatever of the efficiency of the work done by the bureau or its value to our commerce.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Can the gentleman inform us how this ratio of expense would compare to the ordinary ratio of expense on marine insurance in this war, or has that been so different from times of peace that you can not make any comparison?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not. I will say this, however, that the effect of the operation of this bureau in writing war-risk insurance has been to keep the rate at the lowest possible average, and in that way it has resulted in great economies to our commerce on the high seas.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question? Just as a test, has the gentleman ascertained how our account stands as to insurance premiums against losses since the 1st of January this year?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The known losses were about $6,000,000 and a net premium of $10,300,355.20.

Mr. HARDY. That covers the whole period?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The whole period. I think before the 1st of January all premiums exceeded losses approximately by $2,500,000.

Mr. HARDY. We have now exceeded them by over $4,000,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. So that since the 1st of January there is a little profit in that account?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The losses have increased. Before the 1st of January they were about $800,000; they now amount to $6,000,000.

Now, the purpose of this bill, S. 2133, and of the bill H. R. 4050 is to create an insurance, the premium to be carried by the shipowner, protecting the master, officers, and crews of American vessels engaged in sailing through dangerous waters against loss of life or personal injury caused by the risks of war, and to give them compensation should they be detained as prisoners by the enemy; to assist in the prosecution of the war by providing the fullest facilities for insurance against risk of war for vessels and their cargoes destined to countries at war with Germany; to supplement the existing insurance market, stabilize rates, and as a consequence assist the foreign commerce of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would prefer to complete my statement before answering questions.

With these ends in view the bill, if enacted, would make it possible for the United States to enter into a reciprocal reinsurance arrangement with countries which are at war with Germany to mutual advantage. Increased appropriations are sought by the bill which are deemed very necessary, and some other slight changes in the law are sought which, in the light of experience and the increased scope of the bureau's operations are considered essential. All these matters will be dealt with separately and in some detail later.

Seamen sailing on American vessels to the war zone are at the present time exposed to loss of life and personal injury, and it is manifestly necessary that these men on whose services so much depends at the present time should be encouraged to seek or continue in the employment of such vessels by being assured by the Government of proper and reasonable indemnity in event of loss of life or personal injury by war risks, and of compensation in the event of capture and detention by the enemy. The importance and necessity of such insurance through the war zone is so great that the bill provides that when it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury, desirable in the national interest, he may require vessel owners to effect such insurance at their expense. In the event of the owners failing to effect such insurance, the bill seeks to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to effect such insurance at the owners' expense, and in addition a penalty is provided.

In preparing the provisions for indemnifying officers and crews, the effort has been to secure a simple, intelligible, and immediately available method of insurance against the consequences of war perils, recognizing that prompt action is the first requisite.

I may say that the provisions for compensation to officers and seamen in the event of injury or death are framed after the workingmen's compensation laws of two or three of the eastern States and are simple in form and will be very easy of administration.

It is considered desirable as a further encouragement to the men and for their protection that the bureau should have authority to insure their personal effects, which would make it possible for the men to obtain such insurance at a reasonable cost.

Under the bill, if enacted, the Secretary may make reciprocal reinsurance arrangements with other Governments, thus permitting the fullest cooperation on this important matter of war-risk insurance with the Governments of other nations engaged in war with the enemies of the United States. By this means it is hoped to arrive at arrangements with those other Governments allowing the sharing of business, in this way dividing the hazard accepted from a vastly increased number of units, which is manifestly a sounder business method and permits the spread of the hazard without increasing the total liability assumed.

This provision relating to return premiums is necessary for carrying out the ordinary operations of the bureau, as, for instance, where a voyage on which the premium has been paid is not made. In addition it seems desirable to make some provision whereby the profits, if any, of certain classes of business, particularly in the case of insurance against loss of life or personal injury, may, on the termination of the bureau, be divided pro rata between those taking out this insurance.

In other words, the law was not created and this service is not being performed with a view to profit to the Government, but as a service to vessels under the American flag engaged in foreign commerce.

The bureau will now be fulfilling its most important function in assisting in carrying on of the war or the commerce necessary to the prosecution of the war, and should not aim to make a profit from those operations. This is particularly true of the part of the bill relating to personal injury to the men, and it is proposed to fix premiums at rates so that as nearly as can be estimated these rates will represent the cost of doing the business. The provision seeks to make it possible that on the termination of the war any profits which have been accumulated from this source shall be returned to those paying premium on these policies.

Under the act in its original form, premiums and salvages were to be carried into the Treasury. Congress subsequently, in one of the amendments approved March 3, 1917—that is an amendment to the act of August 3, 1916, to which I have referred heretofore—altered this provision and directed that the premiums and salvages should be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the appropriations made in payment of losses and should be available for the purposes thereof. In the light of experience it is necessary, as already explained, to provide for the payment of return premiums, and hence necessary to broaden the purposes of the previous appropriation, both in the part of the law quoted and in that section of the same which appropriates $15,000,000.

In other words, we provide for the repayment of return premiums, also that moneys received from premiums and from salvage shall be covered into the Treasury and reappropriated for the purposes of this act.

The bill provides for an increase of the fund available to $50,000,000. As I stated, the amount appropriated in the act of March 3, 1917, was $15,000,000, and in the act of September 2, 1914 $5,000,000. The House bill, as reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, carried an appropriation of $25,000,000. We are now considering the Senate bill. In the Senate bill the amount is increased to $50,000,000.

Now I will answer the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] if he has any questions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman repeat the capitalization figures? The first bill of September, 1914, provided for a capital of $5,000,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the bill of March 3, 1917, increased it to $15,000,000. This bill proposes to increase it to $50,000,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Fifty million dollars is the sum total of all the capitalization as contemplated by this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; by the Senate bill, which we are now considering.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not $50,000,000 plus $15,000,000 and plus $5,000,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; $50,000,000 as the sum total.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman as to the new insurance features in this bill, covering life, accidents, and personal effects of the masters, officers, and crews? Will that cover alien seamen and alien officers employed on merchant vessels of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It will cover all of the masters and watch officers and crews on vessels of the United States; that is, vessels under the American flag.

Now, under the act passed in August, 1914, it was provided that the President might suspend the provisions of existing law as regard the masters and watch officers on foreign vessels brought under American registry, and under the provisions of that law the vessels of the United Fruit Co. came in, and their officers with them. That act was only intended to cover a limited period of time and to meet an emergency. It grew out of the fact that at the time it was passed officers were not available. With the vast increase of tonnage provided for under the building program now pending, involving an expenditure of $750,000,000 in the next 18 months by the Government; with the vast increase of tonnage under private ownership under the American flag, it will be a very serious problem as to where we will get officers and crews to man our ships. Practically all the officers on merchant vessels under the American flag are American citizens; the law provides that they shall be American citizens except in the instance to which I have referred. We have no laws providing that the crews of vessels under American registry or enrollment shall be American citizens.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is familiar with the seamen's act, which he piloted through the House?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I had much to do in framing it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not that provide against the employment of a certain number of aliens on American ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It admits of the employment of a number of aliens?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not change the existing law at all in that regard.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it requires that the wage standard shall be that of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; it does not provide that. In the seamen's law we repealed or abrogated so much of our treaties with foreign nations as authorized the arrest of seamen for violating their civil contracts of service. The seamen's act also provides that when a seaman's vessel arrives into port he may demand half his wages, and if the master of the vessel refuses to pay him one-half of his wages then due he may sue for them in our courts, and that provision applies to foreign seamen as well as seamen on vessels under the American flag. It was the opinion of those who framed the law, and especially of the labor organizations, the Seamen's Union particularly, that the effect would be to equalize the wage scale on vessels under the American flag and on vessels under foreign flags. There is no specific provision in the act of the kind the gentleman suggested.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill is an insurance bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; in part.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But as I read it it is as much a seaman's bill as it is an insurance bill, in that it is clearly intended to permit the employment of officers and men for vessels engaged in the foreign trade and encourages them to take employment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say yes to that. However, this legislation was not inspired by the Seamen's Union at all, so far as I know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand that to be the fact.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I will say that it was inspired by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance and great commercial interests engaged in exporting and importing, and is intended to facilitate the movement of our over-seas commerce and cover the hazards of the sea, and for the vessel owners, who have found great difficulty in getting officers and men to serve on the vessels going into the war zone.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly; and in getting them even into the normal merchant marine.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; on account of the war risks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is great difficulty in obtaining seamen now.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; notwithstanding wages have been very greatly increased, and bonuses are being paid.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It pertains to war-risk insurance. The gentleman having sponsored the two previous war-risk insurance bills, I was under the impression that they had come from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. But this bill steps beyond the ordinary bounds of war-risk insurance, and trenches upon the merchant marine and fisheries ground, in that it does to a certain extent relate to matters pertaining wholly to the merchant marine and fisheries, to wit, seamen, and their terms of employment.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield, it merely extends over those engaged in running ships to transport our commerce the protection of the insurance scheme that already extends to other agencies of commerce; that is all.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I introduced the original bill creating this bureau.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am well aware of that fact.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say that it came within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but it went to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by direction of the Speaker. I do not suppose the matter was given serious consideration then, and it might well come within the jurisdiction of that committee. There are various bills that may well fall within the jurisdiction of one committee or the other. When I introduced the succeeding bills, including this one, I requested the parliamentary clerk to refer them to that committee, for the reason that it had had jurisdiction of the subject matter from the beginning.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have asked the gentleman these questions because it is possible, this being a war-emergency measure and pertaining to foreign trade, that these special inducements to officers and seamen engaged in the foreign trade may seriously interfere with the domestic trade and make additional trouble for the coastwise trade.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not. I do not think anyone engaged in the coastwise trade would object to these provisions. In fact, the American and Hawaiian Line, that was engaged in the coastwise trade, now has practically all its vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that 's true.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And quite a number of other vessels formerly engaged in our coastwise trade, those adapted to the overseas trade, have voluntarily gone into that trade, on account of the extraordinary demand for tonnage and the very high freight rates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true. They make more money in the foreign trade, perhaps, than in the coastwise trade.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. It was only recently that many vessels belonging to lines engaged in the coastwise trade have been withdrawn because of the exigencies of the foreign trade and the need of tonnage to get food and munitions of war to our allies, and not alone for profit, but with a large measure of patriotism.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has a serious effect upon transportation in the coastwise trade, and particularly upon the transfer of those commodities which are now needed to support the American people. But I wanted to ask the gentleman this: This bill proposes to put insurance upon the life, limbs, and clothing of the men who will engage as seamen in the foreign trade, whether they be citizens of the United States or aliens. That being the fact—and I think the gentleman concedes that it is a fact—what will be the effect upon those engaged in the coastwise trade who have no such inducements to offer officers and seamen?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know of any ill effect. I am in fairly close touch with those engaged in the coastwise trade, and I have never heard a suggestion from them that this would result in embarrassment to those engaged in the coastwise trade. In fact, officers and seamen are reluctant to engage in this foreign trade, because of the extraordinary hazard from the submarines at this time, and to meet the situation I am told that some of the companies are now voluntarily insuring their officers and men as an inducement for them to serve on vessels engaged in this trade.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that offering these special inducements now to seamen will interfere seriously with the business of private companies, not Government controlled, which are engaged in extending insurance?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This insurance is written on all vessels under the American flag.

Mr. SABATH. In the coastwise trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Whether they are Government controlled or not. There is no demand now for war-risk insurance in our coastwise trade, so far as I have any information on the subject. The provisions of the bill are broad enough to authorize such insurance to be written if there is demand for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it is competing with private companies.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no private company that I know of that is writing war-risk insurance. The foreign Governments were writing war risks on their nationals, and hence our shipping interests came to Congress and insisted that it was necessary for us to undertake this task in order to facilitate our commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman states that the losses up to date were about $6,000,000. Of course, that would exceed by a million dollars the original capital of the War-Risk Bureau. The statement by Mr. De Lanoy, who had charge of the War-Risk Bureau, speaking to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, gives the known loss up to April 30, which would be the first four months of the present year, as $4,963,960, or virtually $5,000,000. If those figures are correct and the figures given by the gentleman from Missouri are correct, there must have been a dead loss of $1,000,000 during the month of May.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Up to May 24 the losses were $5,903,587.10.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then there must have been a million dollars' loss in 24 days.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Vessels and cargoes, $689,627.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would indicate that we have been losing more during the last 16 days than at any other period during the life of the War-Risk Bureau.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In April the loss was greater than during any other month.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's figures carry up to May 24 and show a loss of $1,000,000 additional during the 24 days of May, so many ships must have been sunk in the recent weeks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have an itemized statement of that. Only one vessel was sunk in May, so far as now known.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman place it in the RECORD?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman propose to put any data in the RECORD in regard to the character of the cargoes?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I have no such data. I understand up to the 1st of January, 1917—I think that statement was made before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—that no contraband of war was carried.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Prior to the declaration of war I had information from the Treasury Department that contraband was not carried. It is carried now, I presume?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume it is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And is insured by the Government?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I presume so; I can not say definitely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman considered the effect of American insurance on contraband in the matter of reinsurance by foreign countries as proposed by a paragraph in the bill? What risk will the foreign countries assume on contraband consigned to the allies?

Mr. ALEXANDER. American ships? This insurance is written on ships in favor of the owners of the ship and the cargo, and the rate is fixed according to the hazard. Prior to January 1, 1917, I think the war risk was as low as one-half of 1 per cent, but I think it is now 5 per cent, and it may go beyond that.

The only reason that we ask the increased appropriation is that there may come a time when many losses will occur in a short time, possibly while Congress is not in session, and provision should be made to pay them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You had $252,000,000 of risks up to the 30th of April.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The net amount of risks on May 24, 1917, was $150,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The report of the bureau fixes the risks on April 30, 1917, at $252,738,946.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The net amount of the risks up to May 27, according to the statement I will put in the RECORD, is $150,090,252.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These figures would have to be harmonized, because apparently there is a loss of risks amounting to $100,000,000 in 16 days.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman must remember that this amount is shifting from day to day. When a vessel gets into port the liability ceases. The amount fluctuates.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that is true, there might not be need for so large an appropriation as $50,000,000, because the risks seem to have been reduced $100,000,000 in 16 days.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There may not be a present need for it, but we ought to make a reasonable provision for what losses may occur before the next session of Congress.

Now, I want to call attention to this fact. We ask an increase of salary of the director of the bureau, Mr. De Lanoy, from $5,000 to $7,500. From September, 1914, to the 1st day of January, 1917, the work of the bureau did not require all of his time. He had some time to devote to his private business. He is an expert insurance man in New York—one of the best. Now, the work of the bureau has increased so much that it takes practically all of his time. So we are of the opinion that it would be wise to keep him in the employ of the department as director of the bureau. He has made a success in the past, and it would be poor economy to continue the salary at $5,000 and lose his services. So with reference to the advisory board. The existing law provides that members of that board shall receive $25 a day for the time actually employed. The Senate amended the existing law by making the compensation $20 a day instead of $25. I think that very poor economy, because we increase the responsibility of the director and of the advisory board, and the business of the bureau has increased so much that we ought to be willing to pay a reasonable price for their services, and if possible retain the present men in the employ of the bureau, because they are men of very high standing and experience.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no doubt they are competent men. Has the gentleman any figures as to the losses since May 16?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have not. The last one I have is the Hilonian, on May 16, $275,000, cargo $414,627, or a total of $689,627.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was that a cargo of oil?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Is an American vessel defined in exact terms at any particular place in this bill? What constitutes an American vessel?

Mr. ALEXANDER. An American vessel or a vessel of the United States is defined by our navigation laws.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. What I am getting at is this, if the gentleman can inform me: Would a vessel floating the American flag be termed an American vessel, or must a vessel be owned bona fide by American citizens?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No vessel can be registered under the American flag unless it is owned by an American citizen and registered under our navigation laws.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. That is covered under the general navigation laws?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; under the general navigation laws, This bill applies only to vessels under the American flag.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Owned entirely by American citizens.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; a corporation organized under the laws of the United States is an American citizen. All or part of the stock may be owned by American citizens.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. We are not insuring——

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are not insuring German ships, I can assure the gentleman, and we are not insuring British ships or French ships, nor any of the ships of our allies. This bill provides that the board may provide for reinsurance. We are performing services for our allies. It provides that by a system of reinsurance the risk may be scattered, and the risk thereby diminished.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman referred to the report of the committee in raising the salary of the director of the bureau from $5,000 a year to $7,500 a year.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Senate bill under consideration as reported by the committee contains no such recommendation, but it leaves the salary as at present, $5,000. Do I understand it is the purpose of the committee to offer amendments to the Senate bill to harmonize with the House bill as reported?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; in that regard.

Mr. STAFFORD. And not to try to have the Senate bill adopted just as reported from the committee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No. The committee will offer an amendment increasing the salary from $5,000 to $7,500 and submit it to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any other amendments that are purposed to be offered that are not contained in the Senate bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is only one verbal amendment. The word "so" is used at one place improperly. We will strike that out.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, one provision of this bill compels owners to insure the lives and the services of the officers and sailors employed on American ships. Has the gentleman any estimate as to the total amount of insurance that will be required to cover all of the officers and sailors under the terms of this law?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have not.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not through yet. I wish to say that I certainly commend that feature.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is extending the workmen's compensation law to officers and seamen. In case of death or total disability the liability of the owner is fixed at not more than $5,000 nor less than $1,500. The British workmen's compensation law, which applies to officers and seamen, limits the compensation for death or total disability to a minimum of £150 and a maximum of £300. I understand the provisions of this bill are very much more liberal than the British law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to anticipate, but when we reached the item on page 6 I had intended to inquire why the committee limited the amount of insurance on the services of officers and members of the crew to those who will be designated by the assured rather than those dependent upon him. I would think the law is for the benefit of the dependent relatives, when the man happens to be captured, and not merely for the benefit of the detained sailor or officer. I direct attention to line 14, page 6, where the money in case the officer or member of the crew is detained could only be paid to the dependent relatives, in case they were designated by the assured. I would think it would be far better, as it is for the benefit of the dependents, regardless of the wish of the assured, that the money should be turned over to those dependents, even if the assured has not designated them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. STAFFORD. Page 6 of the Senate bill, lines 12 to 14—

> And payment on account of detention by an enemy following capture shall be made to dependents of the persons detained if designated by him.

Why should not the money be paid to the dependents regardless of whether they are designated by him or not?

Mr. ALEXANDER. As this insurance is for the benefit of the officer or sailor, it was thought best to give him the right to say to whom it shall be paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. But if he fails to exercise it and he leaves dependent relatives in this country who are subjects, perhaps, of the charity of the country, why should not that money for which the Government is insuring him be paid to the dependents, so that they may be provided for, and not go, perhaps, to the person detained in a detention camp in Germany or somewhere else, where he would not be able to get the money during the period of the insurance?

Mr. ALEXANDER. He might want the money himself.

Mr. STAFFORD. How are you going to get the money to him if he is detained in Germany?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill provides that the payment provided for in this section shall be made only to the master, officer, or members of the crew concerned, except that payment for loss of life shall be made to the estate of the insured. I think that is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And that payment on account of detention by an enemy following capture shall be made to dependents of the person detained, if designated by him. Otherwise it would be payable to him, and if he could not be reached it would be reserved for him when he is free.

Mr. STAFFORD. How does that improve the condition of his family, of his dependent wife and children who may need this money?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would not care if it was limited and the law provide that it should be paid to his dependents.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was going to offer an amendment that it shall be paid as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, if the bill is amended in that manner, I am frank to say I shall not feel much aggrieved.

Mr. STAFFORD. And in that way make provision for the dependents in case he does not.

Mr. RUSSELL. Who can tell better than the man himself?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary of the Treasury in case he fails to designate them.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. HARDY. I think it would be advisable if the gentleman would make a full explanation of section 2a on page 3, with reference to this reinsurance, so that we might more speedily understand that. That is the comity provision between us and our allies, as I understand, and I would like for the gentleman to get it a little more clearly before the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What is it the gentleman wants to understand?

Mr. HARDY. A full explanation of section 2a, on page 3, with reference to making provision for reinsurance by the United States of vessels of foreign friendly flags. This is a new addition to this law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practical, make provision for the reinsurance——

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman mentioned that incidentally.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Just a moment. This might be used as an illustration. We asked members of the advisory board to give us a statement of how that provision would operate, and they say:

Assuming that United States products to the value of $20,000,000 were to be shipped to Italy, one-half by five American steamers and one-half by five Italian steamers, under the existing arrangements our shipper would be able to protect himself against war risk for the full amount of these shipments by Italian vessels with the Italian Government and for the full amount of the shipments by American vessels with the United States bureau.

Assuming that the maximum value on any one vessel, either Italian or American, was $2,000,000, the effect would be that the United States Government would be granting insurance for $10,000,000, covering on five different vessels as a maximum liability of $2,000,000 each on one vessel, and the situation of the Italian Government would be exactly the same.

With the power which this section would grant to the Secretary, it is expected an arrangement could be made whereby there would be a pooling of interests. In this way the United States Government would still assume an insurance liability for $10,000,000, but it would be divided between 20 units, and the maximum amount for which they would ultimately be liable by one vessel would be $1,000,000, and the position of the Italian Government would be the same. Each would have reduced their maximum liability by any one vessel one-half. The arrangement would therefore be of mutual advantage.

Mr. HARDY. I think I understand it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is an illustration of how it would operate. I have consumed all the time I feel I should.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman inform me how the rates of insurance and rates of premium paid here compare with those paid elsewhere?

Mr. ALEXANDER. What kind, war risk?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I could not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. ADAMSON. Fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. One thing I wanted to ask the gentleman was, what is the purpose of section 1 of the bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the salary of the director of the bureau is not increased I am going to ask to strike that out because in the form that it comes to us from the Senate it is identical with existing law.

Mr. MANN. That is what I knew and I could not see the purpose of having it in the bill,

Mr. ALEXANDER. The only purpose was to increase the salary.

Mr. MANN. It would accomplish nothing and rather grate on the nerves of a man who is not even overly sensitive by calling a preamble to the bill section 1 of the bill which everybody knows it is not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am going to move to strike it out if the salary of the director is not increased.

I will here insert the statement of the operations of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to which I have referred:

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in sympathy with some of the provisions of this bill and shall vote for it, but I desire to present some criticism and make some comment in reference to it. First, I shall offer an amendment to strike out all the resolution portion of the bill. It has no place in this bill. We ought not to have a resolution portion of a bill and then follow it by legislative enactment. You will observe there are two enacting clauses in this bill. I think that is a bad practice and ought to be eliminated. Second, I think we should place a limitation upon the Secretary of the Treasury or the War-Risk Insurance Bureau by providing that whenever the shipping companies are engaged in a conspiracy to fix ocean-rate prices that the insurance should be refused.

It is well known by everyone that these shipping companies all over the country have increased their rates and have doubled and redoubled them until they are about 100 per cent higher than they were before the war commenced.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would suggest to the gentleman that they are several hundred per cent higher.

Mr. DILLON. Yes. But still, when the Government is insuring these companies for full value, we ought to look after the rights of our shippers in commerce.

I want to call the committee's attention specifically to section 2, and it is to this section that I desire mostly to confine my arguments. Under its provisions, if you enact it, we may reinsure the commerce of all the countries. It does not confine itself to the commerce of the United States. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to confine the reinsurance to our own commerce. I see no good reason why we should reinsure the coastwise vessels of England. Do you? I see no reason why we should reinsure vessels sailing from the Spanish ports to the South American coast. Do you? We have undertaken an immense task in our alliance with the European powers. Why do we want to engage in a world-wide insurance or a reinsurance of their commerce, commerce that does not concern our people? We should look out for our own people, for our own commerce. If we would turn our attention to the commerce of South America and build it up, we would be legislating for the American people. But I want some Member who has studied this bill to tell us why we should reinsure foreign vessels that do not engage in American commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say that I do not suppose anybody with average common sense in the administration of this law will do it.

Mr. DILLON. Why not put it into this bill, so that they can not do it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The purpose of this bill is to limit our liability and not increase it.

Mr. DILLON. I suggested to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the reinsurance ought to be confined to American commerce.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but it did not get any sympathy with the committee.

Mr. DILLON. I know it did not, and I appeal to the House that this amendment ought to be adopted. If you will amend this bill so that it will be reasonable in its provisions, I will gladly support it.

Mr. SNOOK. If the risk of this insurance is so great at this time that all the insurance upon this class of business, upon American commerce, must be placed upon this War-Risk Insurance Bureau, I will ask the gentleman what opportunity there will be for that bureau to reinsure in any other way except through some other insurance company insuring the property of some other company?

Mr. DILLON. Under this provision in section 2a you are granting the express power to this board to reinsure, as you will see if you read it, the vessels of foreign friendly flags. It does not make any difference whether it is American commerce or European commerce, you propose to grant this power to reinsure, and it is that to which I am objecting.

Mr. SNOOK. Yes; but if the risk is so great at this time that insurance can be carried in no other way than by this bureau, they can not reinsure with themselves. I suggest to the gentleman. They have got to have somebody else with whom to reinsure.

Mr. DILLON. Yes; they reinsure with foreign governments. But why should we assume risks that do not concern our own commerce.

Mr. SNOOK. They can not reinsure with themselves. They have got to have somebody to reinsure with.

Mr. DILLON. Suppose England is carrying a risk on one of her vessels, and that vessel is engaged in the English coastwise trade, and it never comes to the United States for United States commerce, you are granting the power here to reinsure that.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman is proposing something that will never happen.

Mr. DILLON. Then why grant the power?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Take the case of American ships that England took charge of and that belonged to us, some six or eight months ago, and are still using. They are American ships by the terms of this bill, but the English Government is using them. Under the terms of this bill we would have to insure those ships, would we not?

Mr. DILLON. The bureau could reinsure the insurance of England upon those vessels.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. They are American vessels, but are not manned by American sailors or carrying the American flag, under this bill.

Mr. DILLON. They could be reinsured under the policies of some of the foreign countries that are now our allies.

Mr. JAMES. Would it not also reinsure part with foreign governments, so as to divide the risk? If there is a risk of $2,000,000 on an American boat, we could carry half of that, with some foreign government insuring the other half, making our loss in case of accident $1,000,000; so that it would work both ways.

Mr. DILLON. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. JAMES. That is what the paragraph provides:

> And, further, to reinsure with the governments of any countries which are at war with an enemy of the United States and American vessels and their cargoes.

They may carry $2,000,000 and always cut it up with other insurance companies.

Mr. DILLON. Yes. I think the gentleman is correct. I will pass that point for the time being, but when we reach this question under the five-minute rule I shall refer to it again, because I think it is important that this provision should be modified.

In lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, on page 4, you will find these words:

> And in addition to all other appropriations under this act are hereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of paying losses and return premium accruing under this act.

And then another provision farther along in the bill provides for a revolving fund. The policy of Congress has been, as I understand it, against providing for a revolving fund, and it seems to me that provision should be eliminated.

On page 9 the bill fixes the amount of appropriation at $50,000,000. It seems to me that should be cut down, say, to $25,000,000.

Again, in section 8 you provide for $250,000 for expenses. I want to call your attention to the expenses of operating this bureau, and in that connection to show that there is no necessity for any such an amount of appropriation in this bill. This War-Risk Insurance Bureau has been operating now for two years and nine months. From September 2, 1914, to April 30, 1917, the expenses were $52,447.63.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. DILLON. Can I have five minutes more?

Mr. ESCH. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. DILLON. Again, in the report Mr. De Lanoy says, on page 13:

> Up to the 1st of May, sir, out of the original $100,000 the exact expense has been $52,447.

Taking that as the basis, and admitting that there will be an increase in the insurance business, there is certainly no necessity of appropriating $250,000 for expenses.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The $250,000 appropriated for in that section is not an annual appropriation. We have appropriated for the life of this act, which will be four years more.

Mr. DILLON. Well, if that is true, you can even divide it by four, and then you will have three times the amount that has heretofore been used. The life and personal injuries insurance features of this bill, I think, are good, and I hope they will be retained.

I want to call attention to some figures. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] was not quite accurate in his figures. Possibly I am mistaken, but I have examined the report of the Bureau of War Risk and also the testimony before our committee, and, according to my computation, I figure that the total premiums were $7,793,428.93 down to the last of April, and that the losses were $4,963,960.50, leaving a net to the good of $2,829,468.43.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is up to the last of April?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. This past April, a month ago?

Mr. DILLON. Yes, sir. During the year 1917 the total premiums amounted to $4,548,643.89. The losses were $4,122,108, leaving since January 1, 1917, a net to the good of $426,535.89.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is that up to April 30 of this year?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Now, taking the balance of the year 1914 and the years 1915 and 1916, the total amount of premiums up to January 1, 1917, was $3,244,785.04, while the losses were $841,852.10, leaving $2,402,932.94 balance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did that statement of eight hundred and odd dollars of losses include everything that was in course of adjudication before the bureau, or merely that which was paid up to that time?

Mr. DILLON. That is according to the report of the Bureau on War-Insurance Risks.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wished to ascertain if there were any pending claims at that time.

Mr. DILLON. I can not answer that question.

I want to call attention to another fact. During the year 1916 the bureau had only one loss.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] wanted 10 minutes. Could he get in before that?

Mr. TILSON. I have no objection. I will just be getting my arsenal ready.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask that that time be extended to 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time be extended to 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not intend to discuss the bill that is now under consideration. I take the floor to engage the attention of the committee upon a very important topic, one that is of exceeding interest at the present moment, due to the fact that on next Tuesday the young men of this country from 21 to 31 years of age will register in order that they may form the Army of the United States in the pending struggle against the Imperial Government of Germany.

When the selective-draft bill was under consideration in the House I had the pleasure of offering an amendment so as to include within the provisions of the draft those whom I denominated and termed "alien slackers"; in other words, men who are eating the substance of the United States by virtue of their living here among us, getting good wages, employed in good fields of enterprise, and giving no allegiance to our flag or to any flag on earth.

I want this to sink into your minds fully, that perhaps, and probably, 10,000,000 young men will register next Tuesday between the ages of 21 and 31 years, including aliens, but that when the draft comes to be applied 25 per cent will automatically drop from that number. Two million men between the ages of 21 and 31 will automatically drop from the number of 10,000,000, leaving the task to 8,000,000 men between the ages of 21 and 31.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why does the gentleman estimate 25 per cent? Is not that too high a figure? Has the gentleman any figures upon that? How did he arrive at that figure?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I arrived at that figure from the fact that in the United States there are 6,646,817 foreign-born white males over 21 years of age. That is from the census of 1910. Of that number, 3,034,117 are naturalized—not 50 per cent. So I calculate that between 21 and 31 years of age some 20 to 25 per cent will drop out automatically. Even if it were only 15 per cent, they would drop out, and I am trying to drive home the fact that these men who are eating our substance will do nothing for the flag under which they live and prosper.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Since the census of 1910 have not about 4,000,000 more come in, and are they not nearly all about that age?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes; about 4,000,000 men have come in since 1910. But the thought that came to me was that when our boys are doing the fighting these men left behind, and who will automatically drop out of this enrollment by virtue of their being aliens, will be slipping into the desirable occupations of those who will be fighting for our flag. It is my purpose to drive that thought home, in order that we may legislate in some way to conscript these men, or, failing in that, that we may put a tax upon them, say, of $200 apiece.

Mr. TREADWAY. Has the gentleman any way of estimating the number of the foreign born within the age limit of conscription who have been in this country over two years, the time required before they may file their first papers?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I do not think I have those.

Mr. TREADWAY. I take it those are the ones whom the gentleman desires to reach.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to reach those who have been here over five years.

Mr. TREADWAY. In two years they can file their first papers, can they not?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would rather, of course, get at those who have been here five years. They are more susceptible to what I am after than those who have been here only two years. Those who have been here two years and have taken out their first papers are subject to the draft.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there any record of the number to whom that would apply?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I do not think so. My records that I have here may disclose that fact.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. No; because my time is limited.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These men will all be liable to conscription, will they not?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. No. They will register, but they will not be drafted. Now, I wish to read in my time a letter received from a former Member of this body from the State of Massachusetts, Hon. John F. Fitzgerald, whose activities in this line I commend. He is thinking along the same lines enunciated by myself when I offered the amendment to the conscription bill to conscript alien slackers. This is his letter:

REPUBLIC PUBLISHING CO.,
Boston, Mass., May 29, 1917.

Representative O'SHAUNESSY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose copy of a speech which I delivered in Boston on Sunday last, which I wish you would do me the courtesy of reading. It treats with an issue which I think merits the closest attention of Congress, and it is with the object of asking you to give it some attention that I write this letter.

There are about 1,150,000 males of voting age in Massachusetts, with less than 800,000 legal voters. This means that there are 350,000 aliens in the Commonwealth not subject to military draft. From figures which I have gathered at the State house, 225,000 of these have lived in the United States five years or more, the length of time required for residence purposes for naturalization.

It does not seem fair that the best citizen blood of the Nation should go to the front and these aliens permitted to stay at home. Either they should be conscripted for service under our own flag or under the flag of the Nation from which they are sprung.

In the United States, I understand, there are more than 4,000,000 aliens. I do not know how many of these have been here five years or more, but if there is the same percentage as in Massachusetts there would be more than 2,000,000 aliens who have lived here five years or more. If these men can not be conscripted for service, which I think should be done, they should be made to pay a heavy supertax.

At the time of the Civil War $500 and more was paid by men who wished to escape service. If a supertax of $200 was placed upon 2,000,000 of these 4,000,000 aliens, it would mean $400,000,000. This tax would be but a percentage of the advance in wages these men would receive because of the withdrawal of the American citizens from the ranks of industry into the service of the United States.

Personally I believe that service rather than money should be required of these men, but if service can not be exacted of them, then financial return should be made. It seems a pity that hundreds of thousands of men who are registered on June 5 will automatically drop out of the list of those called upon to serve their country, because they are seemingly without a country.

Hoping that you will give this the attention it merits, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JOHN F. FITZGERALD.

[Applause.]

I also desire to place in the RECORD a tabulation of foreign-born white males 21 years of age and over, taken from the census of 1910, also a list of the figures of the immigration for the year ending June 30, 1917. These lists will contain the countries from which these men come.

I wish also to place in the RECORD with these remarks of mine a newspaper clipping carrying the story of ex-Mayor Fitzgerald's eloquent and inspiring address, so that all of the facts and figures therein contained may be at the disposal of the Members of the House.

TAKES FLING AT ALIEN RESIDENT—EX-MAYOR SCORES 350,000 FOREIGN-BORN MALES OF STATE WHO HAVE NOT EVEN FIRST PAPERS.

Ex-Mayor John F. Fitzgerald took a fling at what he called men without a country last night in an address before the Boston Council, Knights of Columbus, at Cathedral Hall, when he declared that the 350,000 foreign-born males in Massachusetts, exempt from conscription because of their failure to become citizens, should be forced to take up arms for the country whose benefits they enjoy.

WITHOUT OBLIGATIONS.

"This certainly is not fair; neither is it honorable for those men to live in our midst, taking advantage of our civilization, developed through the patriotism and sacrifice of American citizenship, without allegiance or obligation of service to any flag or country," said Mr. Fitzgerald. "And the shame of it is that many of these very men who refuse to answer to the summons of American citizenship demand more pay because of conditions brought about by the withdrawal of their fellow workers who chance to be citizens, and therefore subject to their country's call.

"They do not hesitate to tie up commerce and impede the business of the country by striking at inopportune times, without regard to the consequence to the Nation.

"Why should the best blood of America be spilled in France for the advantage of the fellow who is here and seemingly wants to be a man without a country because to have a country means obligation to fight in humanity's service?

"Just think of it; 225,000 aliens have lived in this State for over five years without even taking out first papers."

At this point Mr. Fitzgerald submitted the following figures of men of every race living in Massachusetts who will be exempt from conscription because they have failed to take out naturalization papers during the last five years of residence:

Austria	2,000
Canada (English)	4,000
Canada (French)	26,000
England	10,000

Ending May 29, we took a census in Rhode Island, but I do not think it was as perfect or as much given to details as in Massachusetts. Up to the close of May 19, 1917, we registered there 115,554 aliens, male and female, of what ages I do not know. I trust, however—and this is what brought me to my feet to-day—that we are beginning a wholesome census of the slackers of America. I trust that we are about to take stock of our patriots. I trust that the day is arriving when those who eat our substance and give no allegiance to our flag shall be taxed or shall be conscripted. There is no question in the world that it brings about a feeling of disgust and of nausea in the breast of an American father, wishing Godspeed to his patriotic son sailing across the sea to defend the flag—and it is worth fighting for and worth dying for any place on earth [applause]—when he realizes that that boy of his, setting out upon such a perilous journey may never come back home again, and that some one else, gathering of the fruits of America, participating in its glories, its benefits, its privileges, does not know the obligations of citizenship. Speed the day when this Congress shall awake to this menace, and shall right this inequality. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, there is after all a certain appropriateness in discussing on a war-insurance bill the things I have here exhibited to your view. I have contended for a number of years that we ought to make reasonable preparation for war, as an insurance against war.

On a former occasion I brought before you a number of death-dealing instruments, being a collection of small arms, small-arms ammunition, and the smaller types of artillery projectiles. I called attention to the fact that these were types of arms and ammunition most commonly used and used in the largest quantities in modern land warfare. To-day I bring you another collection of war implements, a number of them new, for fighting in and from the air. Such engines of death and destruction are not altogether pleasant to contemplate. I am a man of peace, and look longingly for the day when peace will return to bless the earth. If my peaceful inclinations alone were considered, I should be fit to be a Sunday-school superintendent. My lot, however, is not that of a Sunday-school superintendent, but that of a Member of the House of Representatives.

A MEMBER. Are they incompatible?

Mr. TILSON. I fear they seldom go together. Instead of fiendish weapons of destruction I should prefer to have my thoughts dwell upon doves of peace, olive branches, and flagons of grape juice. Being, however, a member of one of the war committees of this House I feel it to be my duty not to shrink from the unpleasant, but by my efforts to aid if possible in giving the membership of this House a clearer understanding of the weapons with which we must win the war in which we are engaged.

I am going to speak to-day on the subject of weapons of war used in and from the air. With the development of the aeroplane it was inevitable that there should come the use of the aeroplane for fighting purposes. At first it was assumed that it would be largely used for reconnoissance work, such as scouting. In order to successfully use aircraft for this work it was necessary to keep the other fellow from getting there first, coming out over your position, and if possible keeping you from passing over his position. Very early in the present war there was fighting from aeroplanes. In fact, the officers who were the first fliers first began to use their revolvers, then they carried shoulder rifles in the aeroplanes, and when they got a good chance they would take a pot shot with them. With the larger use of the machine gun they came to use that. To-day in all aerial fighting they are using two types of machine guns. I have here two machine guns, because they are practically the only types we have now, though we shall soon have a number of others. This is the Vickers heavy type of gun. This one is the Benet-Mercier gun, which we have had for some time.

The larger gun is, as a rule, fastened to the aeroplane in the line of the axis of the machine so that the gun itself is not pointed, but the machine is aimed. Having aimed the machine, the string or trigger is pulled, and the gun is fired.

The lighter gun is used as a turret or revolving gun, sometimes on a revolving pedestal. The larger gun is now being synchronized with the propeller blades so that it is fired through or between the propeller blades. There was some difficulty in doing this at the outset, but it has been overcome. At first it was arranged to fire between the blades, protecting them with metal plates where the bullets hit, but it was not a success; then they discovered that there was a means of synchronizing the propeller blades to the firing of the rifle and this has been accomplished successfully.

Before I pass to the newer types of weapon used in aerial warfare I wish to revert for a moment to some remarks I made the other day in regard to the Springfield and Enfield rifles.

Since that time the Enfield rifle, chambered for American ammunition, has been decided upon for our use, so that point which was not settled at that time is now settled. I wish to say a few words I did not say then, but which are appropriate now. The disadvantages I spoke of the other day related mainly to the lack of uniformity of ammunition. That difficulty still exists and is of importance. However, what we gain by the use of the Enfield I will refer to for just a moment. In the first place, the English rifle that we make in this country is not the old Enfield rifle. It is unquestionably superior to the old British Enfield rifle. As a matter of fact, Great Britain had determined to remodel her rifle, adopt a rimless cartridge, the same type that the United States and most of the other nations are using, and planned to make it .285 caliber instead of .303. All the drawings and specifications were ready, but the gauges, jigs, special tools, and fixtures to manufacture the new rifle were not ready at the time the war broke out. All that they were prepared to manufacture at that time was the Enfield adapted to the rim cartridge of .303 caliber. So they turned to making that rifle with all their might and main. The design of the new gun was changed so as to shoot the .303 cartridge instead of the new one that it was originally intended to shoot. Armed with these modified drawings and specifications, British agents came to this country and made contracts with American manufacturers to produce what they called the improved Enfield rifle. It is decidedly improved. It borrows freely from our Springfield rifle a number of advantageous features which are embodied in the new rifle.

So when we chamber the Enfield rifle to shoot American ammunition we do not chamber the same rifle that they are using, or rather that they are making, in Great Britain. You understand that the Enfield rifles made in this country for Great Britain shoot the same ammunition, caliber .303, as the old rifle made at Enfield, but the rifles themselves are not the same. Chambered for our ammunition, they are shooting the same kind of ammunition that this particular rifle, the improved one, was designed to use, which is an advantage.

There are a few disadvantages in our own rifle, not so much in the rifle itself as in the sight. You notice in our rifle that the rear sight is almost in the middle of the barrel, which makes it very short between the front and the rear sight. You can see what that would mean. Our battle sight is set at 547 yards. That means that when we shoot at 200 and 300 yards, we have to aim not at the target but very much below it. Any of you gentlemen who have belonged to the Guard for four or five years last past and who have had to do target shooting know that when you come to rapid-fire shooting on the short ranges you do not aim at the target at all but aim away down in the bank several feet below the target. Our rifle should be sighted differently from what it is. The Enfield is long from the rear sight to the front sight, and the rifle itself is also longer, which has a certain advantage in the recoil. Then, the line of sight being longer, it is better for the ordinary marksman, who is not an expert or a sharp at the business. He ought to do better shooting with that rifle than he can with the other if all other things are equal.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the point-blank range of that?

Mr. TILSON. This one I have here I think is set for about 300 yards. I have never fired this rifle myself.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. How does the Enfield rifle then compare, so far as removing the condition which you just spoke of in the case of the Springfield, in the short ranges? Does it make any difference?

Mr. TILSON. I think it is fired point blank, as the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] asked, at a shorter range. There ought to be either a new sight adopted so that you aim where you hit at the shorter ranges, or a double sight, so that you could easily adjust it. There is another disadvantage in the sight of our rifle. Put that leaf up in that way [indicating], to 700 yards, we will say, and look through it and you will see that there are four different holes through which you can look in the rear sight. If you happen to be a little bit nervous in taking aim at an animate target, you are very apt to look through the wrong peep, and if you look through any one but the right one, of course, you miss. I do not at all approve of the sight for battle work. It is all right, it seems, for experts at target practice and rifle matches.

Since I came to the House this morning a gentleman from my State has put into my hands another rifle which I hold in my hands. It is the French rifle. I was not able to get hold of one when I made my talk on rifles the other day. See what a beautiful well-balanced piece it is. It is called the Lebel rifle. This rifle is made in Bridgeport under contract with the French Government. I am informed they have about 10,000 of these now on hand and are prepared to make a great many more. You see that it is provided with a very long, keen bayonet. That is another advantage which the Enfield rifle has over the Springfield. It is longer than the Springfield, and as the development of this war has been rather in the direction of cold-steel work than shooting, you can see how important it is to carry a good bayonet. Six inches on the end of a bayonet may help in a tight place.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is the ammunition interchangeable with this also?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no; I am coming to that in a moment. The ammunition differs in all the countries. The French ammunition is the largest of all, .315 caliber. The bullet, as you will see, is a copper bullet, with a rim cartridge, the same as the British. I have brought here some British bullets sectionalized, to show you one of the deciding factors for American ammunition, and to show what I believe to be the superiority of the American cartridge. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] called attention to it the other day when directing an inquiry to me. I will speak of that for a moment before going on. Our bullet, the regular steel-jacket bullet, as you see here, has a solid lead core and is comparatively simple to make. Here on this board are all of the operations in making the cartridge. There are about 75 different operations, but it is an easy cartridge to make. The British cartridge is more difficult to make. Let me give you a little history of this cartridge. In the earlier days, when they used lead bullets, the point of the bullet was more nearly round. When they invented smokeless powder they had to get something else besides lead, because the explosive force of the smokeless powder was so great that it would strip the lead right through the rifling, instead of making it turn around, so that a solid lead bullet could not be used successfully with smokeless powder. They developed a steel jacket. They made it the same shape practically as the old lead bullet for a time. Then, I think it was the Germans who discovered first that if you made the bullet long and very sharp you could get a greater range with it, so they extended the bullet and made it with a long, sharp point.

When Great Britain attempted to do that with her bullet it made the point too heavy. Upon firing it from the rifle, the point being too heavy, it would drop down and soon somersault. Therefore they had to do something to lighten the point of the bullet. What they did was to use aluminum in the jacket ahead of the lead core, and so every British bullet has a little piece of aluminum in it. I have here some bullets sectionalized so that you can see the aluminum point in front of the lead core. The millions upon millions of these which we are manufacturing in this country all have to go through that separate operation of having the little piece of aluminum put into the core of every one. It makes it a slower and more expensive process to manufacture and requires one more additional material. I do not know exactly why the French use the solid copper bullet. It is a little more expensive, and I do not know just what the advantages are.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. By the use of the copper-nosed bullets, are not the injuries caused more dangerous?

Mr. TILSON. I am not really prepared to speak on that side of it. I do not know. From the surgeon's standpoint, I do not know what the effect is.

Mr. ESCH. I understood the copper-nosed bullet was more dangerous and more infectious than the use of the aluminum point or the steel point.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman understands that the aluminum is on the inside of the British bullet. It is not a copper point; it is a solid copper bullet in the French cartridge.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is that copper hard enough so as not to mushroom when it strikes a bone?

Mr. TILSON. I am not able to say as to that. I have not secured information as to the surgical side of these bullets. My work has been too much on the side of means for making the wounds rather than for healing them.

I come now to another form of fighting from the air, perhaps a little more spectacular, and that is the aerial bomb. I have three of these here to-day. This one weighs 100 pounds, this one weighs 30, and then there is a small one here suspended as if in operation. The development of bombing has been rather interesting. After The Hague Convention, to the effect that bombs should be used only against military works, troops, and warships and not against private property, private individuals, cities, or noncombatants of any kind, there was a dropping off in the interest of bomb development. After this war started, and there seemed to be no methods known to man that were not being resorted to, a new interest in the subject arose and work was started again along the line of the development of bombs. Great Britain developed a number. I speak of these because when the commission came over here they brought samples of the various bombs they used. They were largely tear-shaped bombs, all of them firing by contact with the ground. The difficulty is that striking the ground before firing they bury themselves to a certain extent and the explosive force is expended against the walls of the crater. In fact, it is estimated that fully 90 per cent of the force of a bomb dropped on ordinary earth is expended against the walls of the crater. An examination of the fragmentation has shown that a very large majority of the fragments are blown into the sides of the crater. The idea uppermost in mind was to develop a bomb that would explode above the earth. It was sought to secure a bomb that would explode head high. As soon as it burst the fragments driven outward by a terrific force would cover a wide circle before reaching the ground. No foreign Government, so far as I can learn, has accomplished that.

Under the direction of our Ordnance Department a bomb that does just that thing has been developed. A young man by the name of Lester P. Barlow is the inventor. His personal history is a very interesting one. Before he was 18 he enlisted in the Navy as a coal passer and served out his enlistment of four years. While in the Navy he was, in addition to his duties as coal passer, permitted to do something in connection with electrical work, and finally worked as an electrician. I believe he was discharged from the Navy with the rating of third-class electrician. Leaving the Navy, he went into automobile work and became acquainted with explosive engines. In the development of the business of the company in which he was engaged he got over into Mexico and finally made the acquaintance of Villa. For a year and a half he was in Gen. Villa's army, and a very important member of his staff. He was put in charge of the great Mexican Central Railway shops while Villa had control of them and was given carte blanche to go as far as he liked with his experiments. He manufactured there a great deal of the artillery ammunition that Villa used and at the same time experimented on aerial bombs. Villa had a few flying machines, with which he practiced with his bombs and secured some little success with them. He returned to this country after the turn of the wheel in Mexico brought Villa to a place where a young American did not care to remain with him any longer. Finally he came to Gen. Wood and told him what he had. The general looked at it and thought it was very promising. This appears from a letter, a copy of which I have in my hand, Gen. Wood sent him to the Ordnance Department. The ordnance officials looked at his design and sent him over to the Frankford Arsenal with instructions that he should be given every encouragement. It is greatly to the credit of the Ordnance Department that they did this. They gave him every encouragement, furnished him materials and funds to go on with the development of his aerial bomb. Last September he had two different bombs ready for testing. They were believed to be so destructive in character that the ordnance officials did not think it wise to attempt a test upon any ground available for the purpose. They did not dare drop them from an aeroplane, but they loaded some of the bombs of this largest type I have here with a small charge, weighted them with sand, and dropped them from different heights from an aeroplane on the Mineola grounds.

That was in September of last year. I have the official reports of the Ordnance Department which show that every one of them functioned perfectly. There was not a single failure. There was one that did not fire, but it was due to the air valve, and served to prove the safety element claimed for it. There is an air valve at this point [indicating] in the war head that is released when the bomb is dropped from the machine. In dropping it from the machine it was not properly released, and the air valve did not open.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said it functioned perfectly. Does he mean that it exploded before it reached the ground?

Mr. TILSON. I did not say that. I said that this bomb explodes 6 feet above the ground.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will follow me, he will see that is a little bit different from the question he asked me.

This one to which I referred did not function at all under the official test, because the air valve did not work properly. The bomb fell to the earth and buried itself. Although it had this very deadly explosive, although it had the detonator which contains 200 grains of fulminate of mercury, it dropped into the earth and buried itself, and when they took it out the air valve was closed, but the bomb did not explode at all. It was absolutely safe. In other words, it is safe until the air valve is released, which is not done until it leaves the aeroplane in the air.

Mr. HEFLIN. Do you mean that thing will explode from 5 to 6 feet above the ground, no matter from what height it drops?

Mr. TILSON. It makes no difference. If they dropped it from 2,000 or 20,000 feet, it would make no difference. When it comes within a certain distance of the ground it explodes. There were no failures in the test. The failure to release the air valve proved one thing, namely, that the claim made for it that it was safe to handle was correct, because dropping from a tremendous height like that, burying itself in the ground with all that explosive, it did not explode because the air valve failed to operate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it expected to use that kind of a bomb to drop, say, on submarines or small vessels?

Mr. TILSON. They are developing one like that to drop on the submarines. I have seen the drawings. It is on the same principle except its nose. The nose is made so as to operate if it strikes a hard substance and not to operate if it hits water. There is a timing device in this new one in the tail of the bomb that can be set to let it go any depth below the surface of the water before it explodes. If it hits any solid object on or below the top of the water it will explode instantly, but if it is simply going down through the water, when it reaches the depth for which it is set the machinery will set it off at whatever depth it is set for.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How effective would that be if it was dropped in the vicinity of a regiment of men?

Mr. TILSON. Well, they exploded this war head at the Sandy Hook Proving Grounds. They were afraid to drop it from an aeroplane. It is dangerous to drop it within a mile of where anybody lives, and you can not be quite as accurate from an aeroplane as you desire. So they suspended it at the proper distance above the ground on the Sandy Hook Proving Grounds and detonated it by an electric spark. I have some photographs here of the effect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What area would the shot cover?

Mr. TILSON. They said in the official test that for 300 feet around it destroyed everything. The officials took refuge in a bomb proof half a mile from where it exploded and the bomb proof was struck by a number of fragments. Other fragments, the officials testified, went over the bomb proof, above their heads, at terrific velocity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the Government considering this favorably?

Mr. TILSON. They certainly are. They have made a favorable report. One thing they are waiting for is the actual test for accuracy and for destructiveness when actually dropped from the air, and for that they need two things: First, they need aeroplanes, and, in the next place, they need a broad, expansive territory in which to drop it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is personal—but does the gentleman know how old young Barlow is?

Mr. TILSON. He is 30 years old.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was on Villa's staff in Mexico?

Mr. TILSON. He was on Villa's staff in Mexico up to 1915.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is an American, however?

Mr. TILSON. He is an American, and is now engaged in doing this work.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does it make its explosion downward, or is it sidewise?

Mr. TILSON. It explodes horizontally, and with a terrific force. The fragments go in every direction. As soon as the explosion takes place, of course, gravity begins to act on the fragments and they begin to fall slowly or rapidly, according to the force that is behind them. Where there is terrific force the trajectory is rather flat and they will spread in a very wide circumference.

Mr. KEARNS. Is there a core in that that governs it when it is dropped?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. I will explain this to you first. This is one [indicating] that was developed by the same inventor while he was working on that one. This one [indicating] works only on land. If it strikes in the water, it does not work. Here is a small type of the same bomb [indicating]. This is dropped from the aeroplane. When it falls to earth this part mushrooms, and the force striking the lower end of this hits the firing pin and discharges the little charge at the base here which blows this bomb out. Attached to the bomb is a piece of wire, as is shown here, which allows it to go up in the air. This small charge down here throws the bomb upward until it reaches the end of the wire. You can set the wire as long as you please. When it reaches the end of the wire, it gives a jerk that strikes against the firing pin and detonates the bomb. It explodes it as high in the air as your wire is long. That was pretty thoroughly tested out in Great Britain, and I am informed that Great Britain is negotiating for 100,000 of that particular type. It can be made large or smaller, as you please.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. What is that loaded with—what kind of material?

Mr. TILSON. It is loaded with what is known as "T N T," or trinitrotoluol. Everybody calls it "T N T." I have not tried to pronounce the real name of it for a long time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does this thing drop from the aeroplane?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; it drops from the aeroplane. This part [indicating] is the stabilizer. The air rushes through that and steadies it. This end drops first because this end is very heavy.

Mr. HEFLIN. Are these stabilizers sufficient to keep that end pointed toward the ground?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. They have tested it, and it has gone through the actual official tests. It is of cheap construction. You can make this for very little money. This one [indicating] is a little more expensive. I hesitated for some little time about showing how it operates, but, after all, the secret is in the other end and is not revealed.

Mr. CANNON. It is not loaded, I trust? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. No; I can assure the gentleman from Illinois that it is not loaded. When this large one is released from the aeroplane this air valve operates and permits this rod to protrude. Of course the principle of the protruding rod is old. Everybody knew that. That is not information to anybody. Everybody tried to make this explosion above the ground with a protruding rod, but they never found out how to make one that would work. I will not explain just how it operates, however.

The detonator, which is the important point, is concealed up here [indicating]. It rests up here when it is in repose, but after it drops out of the machine it takes this position [indicating]. This point is down, and there is also a little safety device that is put on here. Two little pieces fit in there [indicating], so that as soon as it emerges from the war head they drop out. This rod, you see, is about 6½ feet long, and that is exactly where it explodes. It has not been actually tested with the full charge of "T N T," because we have not many places in the Eastern States big enough to test it without killing somebody. They did test it at Orfordness testing grounds, on the east coast of England. I have some photographs showing its effects on steel plates set up near where it operated.

The destructive effect in water is also quite great, and we have high hopes of using it against submarines effectively. Before I leave this particular thing I shall be glad to answer any questions about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. How long is it expected to be before that is thoroughly tested out?

Mr. TILSON. They are going to test it out on the grounds at Hampton, Va. They have just recently secured the ground. They are expecting to do it soon.

Mr. OLIVER. How rapidly can you turn them out?

Mr. TILSON. That has not been tested yet, because they have not yet reached the stage of manufacture in quantities. They think, however, that they can turn them out as rapidly as may be needed. It is not difficult. It does not require a very large number of special tools, such as gauges and templets. It is of simple construction, and there is no reason why it should not be turned out in immense numbers and at a reasonable price.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DRANE. How many could be turned out in a given time, and what would be the price? That is the question I rose to ask.

Mr. TILSON. It would depend on the number you made. If you made one of these it would probably cost several thousand dollars to manufacture it, to get the material and fashion it by hand. If you had a large number to make, many thousands, you could get the pipe and everything else in large quantities and turn them out quite cheaply, at a cost, I should guess, of probably not over $50 apiece.

Mr. DRANE. Would they fall accurately within a given circle?

Mr. TILSON. Of course, it is a difficult thing always to drop a bomb or anything else accurately, but with this tailpiece here, the stabilizer, they believe from the tests that they have made that they can get a degree of accuracy that will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. HAWLEY. When they used the cloth yard shaft in the English Army in ancient times they placed along the haft of the arrow feathers, so that they did not run straight with the arrow but went around a little, which gave the arrow a circular motion in the air and increased its accuracy. That principle was adopted when they made the rifled gun—to give the bullet a circular motion along the line of its trajectory.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why was not that principle adopted in placing the wing on the tail of the bomb, so that when it dropped it would have a circular motion along the line of its flight and increase its accuracy in descent upon the specified point?

Mr. TILSON. I am not an expert on that. It might be a good suggestion to make to the Ordnance Department.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN. What is the carrying weight of that, may I ask?

Mr. TILSON. The total weight of it is 100 pounds. I am not sure as to the amount of explosive that it contains. I had the impression that 40 pounds of explosive were carried; that is, 60 pounds of steel and 40 pounds of explosive in that head.

Mr. LONERGAN. Over what distance will that heavy bomb carry?

Mr. TILSON. It will not carry itself any distance at all, except when it is dropped. It has no motive power of its own. It will carry from any distance up in the sky from which they drop it. They have dropped it from a height of 7,000 feet.

Mr. FOCHT. The bombs which the Germans have been dropping from the Zeppelins over in England have not been very effective. How does the gentleman account for that?

Mr. TILSON. They have not proved very effective. The bombs that have been used by Great Britain have not been very effective, either. The British commission brought over here everything that they had used. I was permitted to see them. I doubt if any of them are particularly effective, although the use of them seems to be increasing.

Mr. FOCHT. I referred to what the Germans have been using.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can state about the German bombs, for I have seen their effect. The bomb strikes on the ground and digs a hole about 5 feet deep and 15 feet wide, and then all the explosive effect seems to go up in the air. If it falls in the middle of a road, with stone walls on each side, it does not tear down the stone walls on the side of the road, but the effect in the air is such that it shatters the glass in the windows for half a mile around.

Mr. TILSON. That has been the experience that they have had with the British bombs, as I said earlier in my remarks. The effect has been largely against the walls of the crater caused by the explosion, rather than destruction over a wider area. That is what they have been trying to obviate, and what we in this country think we have obviated by causing the bomb to explode above the surface of the ground, so that the effect of the fragmentation is not lost upon the walls of the crater.

Mr. FOCHT. Somehow or other I have not yet got an answer to my question. The only place where bombs have been used to any extent is in England, where bombs have been dropped by the Germans, in London and cities on the east coast of England. It seems, according to the reports, that they have not been very effective.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has just explained that.

Mr. FOCHT. I want just the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. TILSON. My information is that the bombs have not been very effective. If the German bombs are not superior to those that I have seen brought from the other side by the allies, I can easily understand how they are not effective.

Mr. FOCHT. I agree with the gentleman that if the bomb which the gentleman has exhibited here is as successful as is expected it means absolute annihilation, and the end of the war.

Mr. TILSON. They believe that they are going to make it effective.

Mr. SNOOK. Can the ordinary aeroplane that we use in our service carry more than one of these bombs?

Mr. TILSON. It is expected that they can carry two of them.

Mr. SNOOK. Not more than two?

Mr. TILSON. Not the ordinary type of aeroplane, although they are building larger and stronger aeroplanes. The aeroplanes that they have been using in France have been of two types, one of the high-speed type and one of the burden-carrying type. The idea is to use the rapid type to scour the air and make the coast clear, if possible, and then follow with the heavier burden-carrying machines, carrying these missiles.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. What steps are being taken to keep the Germans from getting access to the plans of this bomb?

Mr. THLSON. The Germans know exactly what I have told you to-day. I have information that they knew everything that I have told you, before diplomatic relations between Germany and the United States were broken off.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Then it is safe to assume that they will do just the same as we do.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, they do not know how it is done, and you do not know after what I have said here to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am not an expert.

Mr. TILSON. I am not able to explain it to you in detail, and if I were I should not do so. There are certain points about it that the Germans do not know. At the time it was tested out at Mineola there were great numbers of people gathered all around outside of the grounds, newspaper men and others, but they did not get any information about that, and they are not going to get any information from this.

I can tell you something about the different types of aeroplanes that they use there. We are going to be called on for a large number of aeroplanes, and we are taking steps to produce those aeroplanes. The French are bringing over their engines that they have developed to a very high speed, and they are bringing over some of the German engines of aeroplanes that have been driven down inside the allied lines without being destroyed. They are bringing these, and we have access to all the engines that are used by all the people abroad. Probably the best machine that is being used to-day on the side of the allies is what is called the S. P. A. D., those letters being the initials of the Société Pour Aviatione Deperdussin. The French have gone up from the beginning of the war, when they were making something like 70 to 80 miles an hour, to 130 miles an hour. The S. P. A. D. will make 130 miles an hour. It is believed that the new Albatross that is now being used by the Germans will make 135 and probably 140 miles an hour straightaway. Although the French think they have machines which are as fast as those of the Germans, I have reasons for doubting it. Of course the machine that is able to make the greatest speed, to climb the fastest, get the upper berth and turn its machine guns loose on the other, has a great advantage. It can get above and then make a dive at the other machine and get under its wings. That is the only place where you can not shoot, under the planes of your own machine, and the faster machine can do that by climbing and getting the upper berth and then coming down at its enemy. It makes very dangerous business when you arm those aeroplanes with machine guns and two men, as the French planes are now doing, one man to run the machine itself and the heavy gun and the observer to use the two light guns as turret guns.

Now, just a word in regard to hand grenades and other grenades used in trench warfare. While it is not technically a part of my subject of fighting from the air it is closely connected with it. I have here two samples of the most common types. This in my right hand is the rifle grenade. You see these little marks around it; those are to graduate and determine the distance that you want to fire the bomb or grenade. The first one is 80 yards, and you put it in the barrel of the rifle up to there. Set the ring at the number of yards you wish to fire it, place the rod in the muzzle of the rifle, use the ordinary blank cartridge, and fire it. You point the rifle at an angle of 45° and let it go.

This is a hand grenade pure and simple. You pull out the safety pin, hold down the little lever with your fingers, and then throw it. As soon as you release your hand from the little lever, that flies back, and there is a spring which operates the firing pin, which strikes on a little fulminate and sets off the fuse. It is a five-second fuse, so that from the time you release it from your hand it explodes in five seconds in the other fellow's trench.

At first they threw bombs with a slow fuse dangling in the air. You gentlemen who have read "Mr. Britling Sees It Through" will remember how Hugh in one of his letters tells about the ingenuity of the British; how the slow-burning fuse had a red thread around it, and sometimes when the English would light them and throw them into the trenches they would not go off. The Germans would take them up, relight them, and throw them back into the English trenches, which was not so funny. At times when the fighting was not so active the British would take fine threads of red string and spend hours in wrapping some of the quick-burning mine fuse, a fuse which is very quick of action, and then throw them into the German trenches without lighting. The Germans thinking that it was the old kind that had not gone off, would pick them up and light them and start to return them to the English. Of course they exploded instantly in the German trenches. I do not give this information as official, but give it to you as Mr. Wells gives it in "Mr. Britling Sees It Through."

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. In this warfare I understand the charges by bayonet are an important factor. What is the difference in the reaching length of our guns with a bayonet and the guns used by the Germans?

Mr. TILSON. I have a German Mauser in that vault, but did not bring it out to-day. It is substantially the same length as the Enfield rifle. Our own service rifle is about 4 inches shorter than the Enfield. The Enfield bayonet is about the same length as ours, so that there would be about 4 inches difference in the reaching length. The French have a still longer reach of rifle and bayonet—8 inches longer than the English. When you take into account the fact that the bayonet is used so much, you can see that it becomes a very important weapon.

Now, gentlemen, there is one other thing that is more hellish than anything I have presented. I will just speak of it. It is something that everybody has been trying to do, but we feel that we are making progress. That is the flying torpedo, one that can be fired from a long distance, dropped at the right place, and exploded by the same methods used in this bomb. If it can be perfected, and I believe it is on the road to perfection, the horrible execution that a thing of that sort would do is too terrible for contemplation. If they succeed in operating this torpedo which weighs a thousand pounds, contains 640 pounds of steel for fragmentation, and 360 pounds of T N T, succeed in getting it to the point where it is to be exploded and exploding it at a proper distance above the earth, the destruction will be fearful.

You can only imagine what would be the result when directed against depots, against canals filled with vessels, or against ships in harbors, or against cities, if we are to use them in that way. Of course, everybody is trying to do that thing. We believe we are making progress and will soon be able to do it. I only hope it will never be necessary to use such horrible engines of war in that way.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Is that Barlow bomb lying on the table the actual size of the bomb?

Mr. TILSON. It is. I have photographs here showing the size of the bomb and pictures showing the effect of the bomb after exploding. These bombs are all completed ready for use. All that they are now waiting for is the final test of the accuracy with which they can be dropped, all the rest having been thoroughly tested. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, can we read the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Whereas the foreign commerce of the United States is now greatly impeded and endangered through the absence of adequate facilities for the insurance of American vessels and their cargoes against the risks of war; and

"Whereas it is deemed necessary and expedient that the United States shall temporarily provide for the export shipping trade of the United States adequate facilities for the insurance of its commerce against the risks of war: Therefore

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 1, lines 8 to 13, inclusive, and on page 2, lines 1 to 3, inclusive. This contains the preamble, which seems to me to be entirely unnecessary, as it expresses only the reason for the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 8 to 13, inclusive, on page 1, and lines 1 to 3, inclusive, on page 2.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman strike out the second enacting clause.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is correct.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by including lines 4 and 5, on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 8 to 13, inclusive, page 1, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there is established in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, the director of which shall be entitled to a salary at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the committee wishes to amend that by restoring the figures in the House bill, now on the calendar, and moves to amend by striking out the figures "$5,000," in line 9, page 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$7,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$7,500."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for that, to strike out "$7,500" and make the amount "$6,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$7,500" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$6,000."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would only say that the Secretary of the Treasury has urged upon us personally and by letter that this salary be fixed at $7,500, for the reason that the gentleman whose services he has secured commanded a great deal better salary than that in the private business in which he was engaged and can again be engaged. He is familiar with this business and valuable, and he is worth more than $7,500, and the Secretary thinks he will have to pay him that amount in order to retain his services. Of course it can be said that another man can be secured. That is true, and he might be satisfactory, but the experiment might be costly. This man is satisfactory and he is worth the money.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman tell us who the man is?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. De Lanoy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is not an official at the head of any bureau in the Treasury Department who could not in private employment in these times command a greater salary than that which is being paid to him by law. It is not an exceptional condition to have the heads of departments come before the subcommittee framing the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill and ask for increases in the salaries of the heads of the respective bureaus. For years there has been a persistent effort to increase the salary of the head of the Civil Service Commission from $4,500 to $7,500, and of the assistant commissioners correspondingly. There is this serious objection to increasing the salary of this official to $7,500. You should in no instance increase the salary of a bureau chief to an amount greater than that of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. The Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury receive $6,000 a year, and no one can gainsay that the men who are filling those positions are not the equal and perhaps the superior of the man who is filling the position of Director of the Bureau of Insurance. The mere fact that he is going to do a greater amount of work does not necessarily mean that he should have this larger salary. I admit that he should be granted some additional salary, but I bottom my objection to this committee amendment upon the ground that we should not pay to a subordinate official at the head of a bureau a greater salary than that which is being paid to an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury under whose jurisdiction he is operating.

Assistant Secretary Newton has charge of all the public buildings of the country and the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and only receives $6,000 a year. The assistant secretary of customs, having charge of the administration of hundreds of millions of dollars, only receives $6,000 a year. The head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, who has charge of thousands of employees and performs work of the highest character, who could in private employment command a salary of at least $10,000 a year, is receiving only $6,000 a year. We should go slow and not be carried away by this claim that the head of the department is asking for an increase. That is presented to us time and time again every year when we are going over the estimates with reference to the salaries of all departmental heads and their subordinates. I recognize that the work will be increased by extending his functions under this bill, but the increase here is too great. It is no argument at all that these men can go and gain higher salaries in private walks of life. There is rarely a man who is efficient at the head of any of our departments to-day who can not get a higher salary in private life. I could name by the score men connected with the War Department, the Navy Department, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, or the Assistant Secretary of War, who could all go out in private walks of life and obtain much higher salaries, but they feel there is a duty they owe to the Government to be performed, especially at this time, and they are willing to do their work at a less salary. Why, the Comptroller of the Currency only receives $5,000, and he is charged with the administration of all the national banks; and I could go on and state instance after instance. There is not an assistant head of a department who receives more than $6,000, and why should we single out this one man just because we are branching out in a way his activities. I do not wish to be resisting an increase of salary——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not resisting some increase of salary, but I say the committee should not establish a precedent by increasing the salary in that amount, when the committee on the legislative, judicial, and executive bill will be confronted next year with the effort to have all the other salaries moved up to that amount. We are doing well when we give him an additional $1,000, that much more than the organic act provided. I had no thought that the committee in asking to have this Senate bill considered would ask for any increase in salary, but that they would accept the bill as reported from the committee. They reported the Senate bill without any recommendation of increase of salary. True, the House bill provided for an increase in salary to $7,500. I submit that I think that the committee ought to adopt the substitute I have offered and increase the salary from $5,000 to $6,000.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the views of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, but I want to point out to him, as well as to the committee, that this is different from any other appointment. It is an appointment not permanently in the service of the Treasury, but it is an appointment only for the period of the war. At the expiration of the war this whole business will come to an end.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would rather make my statement first; yes, I will yield; go ahead.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman makes a misstatement.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is not my statement correct?

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill says that this position shall continue for four years.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Well, for four years. It is a temporary thing to meet a temporary emergency. In the next place, he is not an assistant. He is the director of a complicated business involving hundreds of millions of dollars, in which he must assume the responsibility of insuring American ships or not insuring them and fixing rates so that the Government will not lose. It is an expert business, and he has to be trained and know how to take the responsibility. It is not an easy task to get the right man to manage this temporary department of war-risk insurance. It is not a Treasury Department bureau, but what we are really doing is adding a separate bureau of the Government as an agency of war. I do not think we can get a good man for less than $7,500, and the wonder is that we can get him for that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to call attention to the fact that this salary is not a charge on the Treasury of the United States. It is possible it may become so if the premiums for war-risk insurance business might not equal the losses, but I assume that those who are directly affected, the great commercial interests and steamship interests, want the very best man possible at the head of this bureau.

And in view of the experience of Mr. De Lanoy since this bureau was created, the entire satisfaction with which he has discharged his duties, the fact that now practically all of his time is required in this work, I question the wisdom of not increasing the salary. I am sure we want efficient work. We want the very best talent. We are paying the members of the tariff and other commissions $7,500 or more a year, and I do not know of anyone on these commissions who is charged with greater responsibility, or where it requires greater order of talent, than to direct the business of this bureau.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the secretary of the reserve gets $9,000 a year salary?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] suggests this is not a charge on the Treasury. I fail to understand, then, why it is necessary to increase the appropriation to $50,000,000 now out of the Treasury.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think if the gentleman had paid attention to my remarks, he would see that I said that it is not now a charge on the Treasury but may be.

Mr. MANN. He said it was not a charge on the Treasury.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is not.

Mr. MANN. It is a charge on the Treasury. That is exactly what it is. But it does not make any difference whether it is or not—not a particle. Here is a man who went into the office when it was provided that the office should only exist for one year, at a salary of $5,000 and glad to get the job.

Mr. COX. He has never resigned, has he?

Mr. MANN. He is a good man. And we extended his term of office for two years, and he was glad to occupy it at $5,000. Then we extended his term of office another year, and he was glad to keep it at $5,000. He is a good man, and I think he has conducted the office very well. It is a small office and there is not much responsibility to it. There is not much labor about it and there are very few employees connected with it. You could not employ very many in this line of business. Now, it is proposed to extend the act another year with a possibility of extending it three years beyond that, and because of the shortness of the tenure of his office, suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], we ought to increase the salary now to $7,500 a year. He is sure of four years more if this bill passes, while before he was only sure of one year at a time.

Mr. SIMS. Let me say that this gentleman said that so far he had not had to bring his family to Washington and increase his expenses, but now that his duties are so large he had to bring them here and greatly increase expenses.

Mr. MANN. Before this he has maintained two establishments, but now he has to maintain but one, and he wants $7,500. That really does not quite appeal to me.

Mr. SIMS. Maybe it does not, but it appealed to the committee.

Mr. MANN. He is a good man. He does not have as much responsibility as a great many chiefs of bureaus because he does not have near as many people to deal with and not as many complicated questions to deal with.

It is a time when we have got to economize, gentlemen, publicly and privately. We ought to economize publicly as far as possible; we ought to make no expenditures that are not absolutely necessary except connected with war. We will waste lots of money in that way at the best. We will have to learn in our private lives to economize. We will have to learn before long that men who are now occupying positions which are not necessary shall cease to occupy those and go to work producing something. And when we have done all that we will have to draw on the women to do a large share of the work, which we never thought of women in connection with. And unless we lay down the policy and stick to it we will be lost. Every department of the Government, every head of every department of the Government, always wants to increase the salaries of the officials and the employees, and usually they can give a great deal better reason than is given in this case.

Now, just a word about this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported the House bill carrying a salary for this official of $7,500 a year. It is on the calendar. Then they reported the Senate bill, which carries a salary of $5,000, and did not propose any amendment to it. Then they asked unanimous consent in the House to take up the Senate bill for consideration and obtained unanimous consent. I, for one, being familiar with both sides, supposed that the committee intended to consider the Senate bill as they reported it. Now we take up the Senate bill and propose to offer an amendment to make it conform to the House bill, which is under consideration, and I say, without meaning any undue criticism, I do not think it is quite fair to the House. I do not think the man's salary ought to be increased at all, and I do not think he will resign the office, but if he does there are lots of other marine-insurance men who will be very glad to get it, because there are very few of the marine-insurance men engaged in much business at present. There are plenty of opportunities to get marine-insurance men, and good ones, to serve the Government at $5,000 a year or for a good deal less. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by my colleague, Mr. JAMES, at Arlington on Memorial Day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 2 of such act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the said Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, and personal effects of the masters, officers, and crews thereof against loss or damage by the risks of war, whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels, or the masters, officers, or crews of such vessels, are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

"The Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance by the United States, as further provided in section 3a, of masters, officers, and crews of American merchant vessels against loss of life or personal injury by the risks of war, and for compensation during detention following capture by enemies of the United States whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that in any trade the need for such insurance exists."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DILLON offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 23, after the word "terms," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following words: "Provided, That when it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the ocean rates charged by the owners or operators of such vessels are unreasonable or confiscatory, or when such rates are fixed by an unlawful combination of owners or operators engaged in shipping, then it shall be the duty of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance to refuse insurance on such vessels."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill or to any section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It seems to me very clear.

Mr. MANN. Let us see about that. I do not think I am in favor of the amendment, but here is a section, Mr. Chairman, which makes provision for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freights and passage moneys, and so forth and so on, including officers and everything else. Now, that is the authority to make the insurance. A limitation upon that authority, of course, is germane to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks this amendment is in the nature of a limitation on the paragraph and overrules the point of order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this is not an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is clearly germane to the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question whether the amendment, unless the Chair has ruled——

Mr. COX. He has ruled.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that in case there is a combination of shipping companies to fix rates, or where the prices are unreasonable, the Secretary shall decline the insurance. This amendment will place that power in the hands of the Secretary in order that he may compel reasonable rates on ocean shipping.

As many of you know, immediately after the European war commenced insurance rates increased over 100 per cent. They were beyond all reason. For instance, in 1916 the Bureau of Insurance had insurance upon but one ship that was lost. The ocean rates have been entirely too high, and it is evident that there has been a combination among the shippers to fix ocean rates. Why should not the shipper of commerce be entitled to protection? It leaves it all in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and if he finds that the rates are too high he can decline the insurance. It seems to me that this is reasonable legislation, and that this committee ought to adopt it.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] seeks to put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury a certain power with reference to ocean freight rates, a power that was not contemplated under any existing law; a power, however, which has been placed in the hands of the Shipping Board, an independent governmental instrumentality. The amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse this insurance if in his opinion the rates charged by any vessel are discriminatory or confiscatory. What power is lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury to determine the question whether ocean rates are discriminatory or confiscatory? What standard has he, what method has he, of determining that question of fact? It seems to me if this is carried out and the amendment adopted it would lead to infinite confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 18, after the word "thereof," insert the words "who are citizens of the United States or who have declared their intention to become citizens."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this new paragraph provides an unusual inducement to men to engage in the merchant-marine service. We are now enlisting and will shortly conscript hundreds of thousands of young American citizens for the American Army and the Navy. They will have no insurance guaranteed them by the Government of the United States. In fact, their insurance rates are going to be raised, because the private insurance companies in which they now have policies have already indicated in many instances that they propose to charge higher premiums on all who take the war risk, whether voluntarily or otherwise. I believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine, but this is certainly a new way of doing it. It is an offer—a bid, in fact—by the United States to officers or masters and crews to come into the service of the merchant marine that does not apply to our soldiers and sailors. It says, "If you will come into this service, the Government of the United States will guarantee that your family shall be insured against your death; that you shall have insurance in the event of accident, and, even if your effects are destroyed or your clothing is damaged, you shall be paid for that." It is an unusual and a new proposition. I understand that it is done to obtain men to man the ships in a hazardous business. Just now they are hard to get. They have been scarce enough since the passage of the seamen's act; but are they so badly needed by the merchant marine that the Government is to create this insurance fund and extend it to aliens—men who are not citizens of the United States?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. I am for this provision to insure these men, but can the gentleman see any real justice in insuring this class of men on the ships and not insuring the men on the firing line in France?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the very point I am making, that the man who goes into the service of the United States in the Army will have his insurance premiums raised, and that the man who goes into the merchant-marine service will have insurance guaranteed and no premiums to pay.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman think that if the men in the merchant-marine service have their lives and personal effects insured the men on the firing line ought likewise to have their lives insured?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should like to see them have their lives insured. They have to pay their own premiums, and many companies have given notice that they will increase the premium rates on those who take the war risks.

Mr. JAMES. That applies only on new policies, not on old ones.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The effect is the same. If the man offers his life to the service of his country he has to pay a higher insurance premium.

Mr. JAMES. Not on his policies that he has already taken out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows very well that the average man who takes up the business of fighting for his country and runs the risk of laying down his life will have to pay a higher premium.

Mr. JAMES. Not on old policies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume the new rates are based on probable losses.

Mr. JAMES. It does not apply to any policy that has been in force a year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the last week I have seen the answers of numerous presidents of insurance companies indicating that they propose to raise the rate on the men who go to war.

Mr. DILLON. Does not the gentleman overlook the fact that it is the shipping company that is required to issue the insurance, not the Government?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The provision is that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance shall make provision for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, and so forth. That is the commodity clause. Then it is to provide for the insurance of the personal effects of the masters, officers, and crews.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman will examine the bill——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I know there is another paragraph, which provides that the Government will require the owners to insure the men if it is not done voluntarily, but that does not alter the alien question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment if adopted would result in confusion. What is known as the seamen's law does not contain any provision that seamen on ships shall be American citizens. That has not been the law since 1882. We are having the greatest difficulty now in getting seamen on our merchant ships. At least 75 per cent of the seamen on vessels under the American flag are foreigners and have been for many years past. I can not imagine any better way to cripple this law, to handicap our merchant marine, and defeat the very purposes to be accomplished by this bill than to say that this insurance should only go in favor of officers and seamen on vessels under the American flag who are American citizens, or who have declared their intention to become such.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am fairly cognizant of the fact that the shipping interests are badly in need of men, and since the passage of the seamen's act the difficulty has perhaps been greater than ever before, with all due deference to the ability of the gentleman in getting that act through; but it is true, as the gentleman states, that we have to depend very largely on foreigners for such American merchant marine as we have now. We have to depend on the captain, the seamen, and others on shipboard who are aliens of the United States. We have to depend now on Germans, and I think there are perhaps a thousand Germans, not citizens of the United States, engaged in this very merchant marine service carrying commodities across the sea. We have to depend on Japanese and Chinese, and my question is whether we had not better in this bill undertake that men who expect to be paid for entering the service of the United States, with the insurance on lives, limbs, and accidents and their clothing, should be those who indicate their purpose to become citizens of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This is a charge against the shipowner. He is required to take out this insurance in favor of his crew, and in the event that he fails to do so the Shipping Board will do so and it will become a charge against the vessel, and the owner will be required to pay it. This is a poor time to restrict a policy and say that the benefits of legislation shall be confined to American citizens at a time when we find it difficult to get men of any nationality to go into the war zone. It would preclude the English, it would preclude the French, it would preclude the Italians, all our allies, from serving as seamen on American ships. There are very few Chinese and Japanese in the North Atlantic service, so far as I know.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want some information. Did not Congress some time ago give the administration power to commandeer vessels and their crews for the merchant marine?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is a bill pending, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, that would give the Naval Department the right to commandeer a certain class of vessels.

Mr. COX. At this time there is no general law in reference to giving the President power to commandeer vessels for the American merchant marine?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No.

Mr. COX. I know that the gentleman is stating the fact about the difficulty in getting seamen, and I thought if we had the power to commandeer the ships and crew that might alleviate it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that it is not the purpose of this bill to interfere with the legal relations between the masters of the ships and the crews, but merely to compel the masters to see that the crews are insured and let their domestic relations on their ships remain as the law now fixes them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make an inquiry. I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose to limit this insurance to shippers in American vessels, or whether the insurance may be extended to shippers in any character of vessel. I direct the gentleman's attention to the language of the bill as found in lines 19 to 23, page 2, which says:

> Against loss or damage by the risks of war, whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels, or the masters, officers, or crews of such vessels, are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, what is the question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether the insurance may be extended to shippers in other than American vessels, or whether only to those shippers who utilize vessels with an American register?

Mr. ALEXANDER (reading)—

> Whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms.

It is intended, of course, to apply to American vessels and cargoes shipped in American vessels.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the purpose, should not the comma after the word "shippers" be eliminated?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman suggests that, I have no objection to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. As it is here, it would enable shippers in any character of vessels to obtain United States insurance. I move to strike out the comma after the word "shippers," in line 20, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. STAFFORD moves to strike out the comma after the word "shippers," on page 2, line 20.

Mr. MANN. What is the difference?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is intended to extend this insurance only to shippers in American vessels, whereas with the comma there it would extend the insurance to any character of vessel, whether American or foreign.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 3. That there is hereby added to such act a new section, to be known as section 2a, to read as follows:
>
> "SEC. 2a. That the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make provisions for the reinsurance by the United States of vessels of foreign friendly flags or their cargoes, or both, when such vessels or their cargoes are insured by the Government of any country which is at war with an enemy of the United States; and, further, to reinsure with the Governments of any countries which are at war with an enemy of the United States American vessels and their cargoes."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. O'SHAUNESSY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3971) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments, had agreed to the further conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr.

MARTIN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DILLON: Page 3, line 17, after the semicolon, insert: "Provided, That no reinsurance shall be effected or permitted unless such vessels are engaged in foreign commerce of the United States or such cargoes constitute such commerce of the United States."

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment raises a very important point in this bill. It relates to the reinsurance clause. If you will observe the reading of section 2a you will see that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is authorized to make provision for the reinsurance by the United States of vessels of foreign friendly flags or their cargoes, or both, when such vessels or their cargoes are insured by the Government of any country which is at war with an enemy of the United States. Under my amendment you could not reinsure except it be on a vessel engaged in commerce of the United States. Under this bill as it is drawn you can reinsure, if you wish, coastwise vessels engaged in English traffic that may never reach American trade; you can reinsure all South American commerce that goes to England, to Italy, or to France, or to Russia. We are not interested in that kind of commerce; it does not concern us. Let us build up our own commerce. Why should we reinsure commerce running to the other countries that is not connected with our American commerce? For instance, England can insure its own vessels engaged in South American trade. Then they can come over here and ask us to reinsure. Do we want to engage in that enterprise? I submit to the members of this committee that we ought not to do so. There is no good reason why we should protect the commerce of the other countries. Let us look after our own commerce. I can see many reasons why we are interested in our own commerce, but why should we legislate for the allies in their commerce that is not connected with own own? That is what this bill means, and I hope that the chairman of the committee will accept this amendment so that it may be incorporated as a part of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as I heard the gentleman's amendment read, it seems to me that it rather prejudices the possibility of the insurance of the coastwise trade of the United States. Did the gentleman have that in mind?

Mr. DILLON. Oh, no; this feature is the reinsurance clause which my amendment seeks to amend. It has nothing to do with the other branch of insurance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the amendment limits the advantages of the paragraph to such American commerce.

Mr. DILLON. On reinsurance only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it is the reciprocal insurance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But that would cut out the coastwise trade.

Mr. ADAMSON. We do not expect them to insure our coastwise trade anyway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman from South Dakota is arguing that we ought to build up our own trade, and indicates that England is taking good care to build up her trade.

Mr. MANN. The coastwise trade is insured under another section.

Mr. DILLON. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee briefly to the proposition contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON]. This question was all thrashed out before the committee, and there can be no question about what the intention of this provision in this bill is. It is not a novel provision nor is it the intention, as the gentleman says, to build up the foreign commerce of this country. Now, the provisions of the amendment proposed by the gentleman would prevent us from doing the very thing the bureau wishes us to do under this provision of the bill; that is, reinsure with our allies, the people with whom we are as much interested as we are in ourselves. This is not a novel proposition, as shown before the committee. It is applying the simple method that the fire insurance companies, the life insurance companies of America apply every day in the year. For instance, if a fire insurance company would take a risk of $100,000 on a block it divides that insurance up among a half dozen companies, so if there should be a fire, a conflagration, the loss would not all bear upon any one company. The life insurance companies of this country do the same thing. If they take $100,000 risk upon one man they divide up among four, five, or six companies, so that when they come to pay that one company will not have the whole risk to assume, and that is what the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance wants to do in this case. They want to divide this insurance up with our allies.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. I have not the time. They can not insure themselves. They are the only people practically writing this kind of insurance now. They can not reinsure with their own bureau, but we can reinsure with the allies with whom we are trading—the Italians, the British, and French people, who are carrying on this campaign. If we wrote this provision into the bill which the gentleman asks us to do at this time it would nullify the whole effect of this provision of the bill. As it is now we are simply doing what is done every day in the life and fire insurance business of America.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman has not consumed his time. Will he now yield for a question?

Mr. SNOOK. Certainly.

Mr. DILLON. If the gentleman's position is correct, why would not it be a good thing to go over and reinsure on fire insurance?

Mr. SNOOK. It would probably be good for the companies, but we are not in that business now. We are in the business of writing war-risk insurance on vessels engaged in foreign trade and we are confining ourselves to that one subject, and the bill asks to apply this simple principle——

Mr. DILLON. Their commerce has nothing to do with our commerce.

Mr. SNOOK. Certainly, the commerce of the allies has everything to do with our commerce. We are just as much interested in the commerce of the allies at this time as in our commerce.

Mr. DILLON. Upon the same theory the gentleman would advocate the reinsurance in the allied countries on fire insurance?

Mr. SNOOK. Oh, no; we are not doing that. We are asking to take advantage of this reinsurance provision to help ourselves——

Mr. DILLON. To help ourselves is to build up our own commerce; not theirs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read this section, 2a, it is broad enough to permit reinsurance of commerce other than American; that is, it would permit our War-Risk Insurance Bureau to reinsure commerce between England and Italy, which had no relation whatsoever between the United States and any foreign country.

Mr. SNOOK. Oh, well, the bureau is not going to do anything of the kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether it does or not, does not the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota limit that commerce to that which is purely American between our country and any of the allied countries?

Mr. SNOOK. No; it does not; it limits it to American commerce pure and simple.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to have the amendment again reported.

Mr. SNOOK. Here is the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. SNOOK. It limits it to American commerce purely.

Mr. STAFFORD. I give a different construction to the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SNOOK. Purely commerce of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. SNOOK. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This provision is broad enough to issue war-risk insurance on our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, and I imagine if a German submarine would come to this side and menace our coastwise trade there would be a demand for this insurance, and it would be unfortunate if the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota should be agreed to, assuming that it would do something that no reasonable man, I think, would do.

Mr. MANN. Where does the gentleman get his authority for the statement that this is broad enough to cover insurance in our coastwise trade?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no limitation in it at all as to any trade.

Mr. MANN. It provides for reinsurance of United States vessels flying foreign friendly flags or their cargoes. That is all this does. The latter part authorizes the foreign countries to insure.

Mr. SNOOK. That is what the gentleman is trying to cut out, the insurance under foreign friendly flags.

Mr. MANN. I understand what the amendment is. This has nothing to do with the coastwise trade.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON], in speaking of the fire insurance, I will state that the American fire insurance companies do reinsure with foreign companies. In San Francisco the American companies insured with the Trans-Atlantic, a German company, and they carried so much reinsurance from the American companies that they only paid 30 cents on the dollar at the time of the fire.

Mr. DILLON. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Do you favor allowing the United States to insure a vessel that is running from England to a South American country and engaged in South American commerce?

Mr. KETTNER. I do.

Mr. DILLON. To reinsure?

Mr. KETTNER. To reinsure.

Mr. DILLON. Then you believe in going into the reinsuring business the world over?

Mr. KETTNER. We always have.

Mr. DILLON. The Government has never done anything of the kind.

Mr. KETTNER. The Government should carry insurance business along business lines. Fire insurance business has always been conducted in that way.

Mr. DILLON. I am talking about the National Government. You would send agents over there to inspect these vessels engaged in a world-wide trade, whether it concerns their vessels or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is now half past 5 o'clock. I understand from the agreement of yesterday, as it was stated by the Speaker, that this bill is only probably privileged to-day.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would not that have to be arranged in the House?

Mr. MANN. It would. But I suppose the gentleman would not want to rise if anybody here indicated he would not want to give the privilege in the House. If there is anybody that has such an opposition to the request, he might indicate it. Otherwise we might stay here. If he does not have any opposition, I suppose we will rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was definitely understood between us that it would remain privileged.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker stated the case the other way.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asks if the gentleman is willing to read the next section and then stop?

Mr. MANN. No. There is further controversy over this section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2133) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill remain privileged to-morrow and until it is finally concluded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill remain privileged to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMSON. And until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. And until disposed of. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT OVER MONDAY AND TUESDAY NEXT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent; and before doing so, I would like to make this statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, upon Monday next there is to begin in this city a reunion of the United Confederate Veterans.

It will be a very unique thing in the history of the world. There are those of us who desire very much on Monday to have the opportunity of meeting and greeting these gentlemen who will come here and of showing them such personal courtesies as we can; and I would like to know if it were possible to arrange now some agreement whereby it will be understood that the House will adjourn immediately after the reading of the Journal upon Monday.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we have sent out two notices which have not yet reached the hands of Members on this side of the House, but will very soon, and I may be divulging some confidences to state to the gentlemen on the other side of the House what is in this notice, but we have very little to conceal. First, a conference of Republican Members will be held in the Hall of the House immediately after the adjournment of the House on Monday, June 4, 1917. The Republican Members of the House are requested to be in their seats when the House meets on Monday, June 4, 1917. Now, if the gentleman desires to ask unanimous consent that Tuesday be substituted for Monday, I will not make any objection, and we will send out notices accordingly.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HULBERT. I merely want to suggest to the gentleman that Tuesday is registration day under the conscription act. It is going to be very generally observed as a holiday, at least up in my section of the country. I had been in hopes that there might be some agreement reached whereby there would not be any session of the House on that day. Does the gentleman know whether there is any such thing in contemplation?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not. I will say frankly that I am making this request without consulting anyone except the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to whom I explained the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will substitute Tuesday for Monday I shall not object. I would like to know, so as to send out notices. Monday is suspension day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; that is true. I did not intend to make my request so as to interfere in any way with the Republican caucus that has been called nor with the business of the House, except that those of us who desire to do these personal courtesies could feel free to do so without having the gentlemen here for business purposes in the House on that day. I hardly feel justified in making the request that Tuesday be substituted for Monday unless I can have a conference with some other gentlemen. I do not know what business will be anticipated on Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that any visitors will come up on Monday under that provision, but we have not had a suspension House for some time or a Unanimous Consent Calendar for some time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think without a further conference I will not make the request. I will let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. It will be too late for me to send out notices to-morrow, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday may be in order on Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. And that when the House adjourns to-morrow——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will make that request later.

Mr. MANN. Put them together.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Tuesday at 12 o'clock——

Mr. ADAMSON. And that the business in order on Monday will be in order on Tuesday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I make that a part of my request.

The SPEAKER. And that the business ordinarily in order on Monday will be in order on Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know the purpose. I came into the Hall after the gentleman from Tennessee began his remarks.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I stated that on Monday next there begins in this city a reunion of the Confederate veterans. There are those of us, as the gentleman can very well understand, who desire to have an opportunity of meeting these gentlemen on Monday. Many of them will be here for the first time, although they tried once before to get here. [Laughter.] We wish to show them whatever personal courtesies we can, and we desire to do that without feeling that we are neglecting our duties in the House on Monday. That is the reason I assign.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is there a precedent for this most unusual undertaking?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; there is not for this particular proposition. Of course, on Decoration Day we have had agreements to adjourn over during that day in advance. It has never been stated just why. I am not asking for any official action. I tried in my statement to prevent any sort of official appearance being given to the proposed adjournment.

Mr. MANN. It is for the personal convenience of various Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is precisely the idea that I had in mind.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is another organization of the same character which has met in this city——

Mr. MANN. I do not think while Congress was in session.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not informed as to that. I was wondering whether any official notice was taken of their presence by suspending public business.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What I wanted to avoid was putting my request in a shape that would indicate official action.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I appreciate the very apparent delicacy of the gentleman's position, but anything that is done on this floor by a Member of the House is anything but unofficial, and if we adjourn public business, from that very fact it must be official or it will be of no avail.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his request.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, Mr. Speaker, he will renew the request. If not, I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not wish to do any indelicate or embarrassing thing. I framed the request as delicately as I possibly could, and stated the reasons as clearly as I possibly could. If there is the slightest objection to it, I will withdraw the request.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I renew the request.

Mr. HULBERT. I will ask the gentleman to make the request for Wednesday. There are quite a number of Members of this House whose convenience would be greatly served by being permitted to be away on Tuesday, quite as many as there are who desire to be away on Monday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, I shall not object to that, if the gentleman desires me to modify the request in that respect.

Mr. HULBERT. I will ask the gentleman to modify it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday shall be in order on Wednesday.

Mr. HULBERT. On Wednesday at 11 o'clock or any other hour, instead of Tuesday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] say to that?

Mr. ADAMSON. That means an adjournment for two days.

Mr. MANN. I do not think I have any objection. I think, so far as the House is concerned, we have reached a point where it will not make any difference. It may be more convenient for Members, and we are pretty well up with the business. We shall be waiting on the Senate pretty soon, anyhow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I modify the request and put it in this form, that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet on Wednesday at 11 o'clock——

Mr. MANN. Twelve o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On Wednesday at 12 o'clock, and that the business in order on Monday shall be in order on Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Notwithstanding Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. ADAMSON. And if we get through with that business we can take up Calendar Wednesday business afterwards.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the proposition that is before the Senate at the present time is an amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] which provides that the 640-acre homestead act which was passed in the Sixty-fourth Congress shall be so modified as to permit entries without reference to the designating provisions which were contained in that act. In other words, it permits the filing of homestead entries upon all the remaining grazing and agricultural lands in the State of New Mexico, the State of Colorado, the State of Utah, and the State of South Dakota.

There has been a dispute as to the wisdom of passing this amendment. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] has contended that it should not be passed, and he has stated certain objections which it seems to me are not well founded. He refers to the fact that there might be large areas of merchantable timberland which might be taken up. There is no occasion for alarm upon that score, because the Interior Department and the Department of Agriculture have taken every acre of land containing a stick of timber that is worth selling or putting in the market and reserved it, and the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from New Mexico only applies to "all public surveyed unreserved lands" within the States named. Consequently, it seems to me when you conjure up a theory that there may be taken large areas of lands that are valuable for timber, the contention can not be supported. For the last 20 years the department has been reserving every acre of land which could be subject to reservation because of its timber value. The amendment which is offered by the Senator from New Mexico does not and can not apply to those lands.

The Senator from Wisconsin says also that there might be some lands that would be susceptible of irrigation. There is no danger of any of these irrigable lands being wasted. In the first place, all the available lands for irrigation enterprises of a limited nature, which would apply to a man taking up 640 acres, have been entered and patented. Some large enterprises might be undertaken covering vast areas, but nearly all the waters of the streams of my State and, I am convinced, of New Mexico also, have been appropriated long since, and only some reservoir sites are left. That would be about the only available source that could be used in the irrigation of lands, and those would not be subject to be taken up by a homesteader, because they have been largely reserved for power purposes, and because it takes infinitely more money than the value of a homestead to construct such reservoir. So the points of danger that have been referred to, in my judgment, do not exist, especially not in the State of New Mexico or in the State of Colorado.

This whole evolution in homestead laws has grown out of the physical conditions resulting from the arid and semiarid nature of the lands of the West. One hundred and sixty acres of land in the humid regions that were available under the original homestead-entry laws were worth ten times the amount of money in productivity as these unappropriated lands in the State of Colorado.

Of course we have reclaimed large areas of land by irrigation. There is no land in the world that is superior to that, but all the waters have been appropriated except those that might be used in newly constructed reservoirs.

The object and purpose of the homestead law has been to permit a person to avail himself of the public lands for the purpose of making and building a home. He can not ordinarily do it from the remaining public lands with any less acreage than 640 acres. It is true that under the 320-acre homestead act we have had a considerable number of entries, but only about 25 per cent of the entries are perfected to patent. They are relinquished largely and new entries made in lieu thereof. Notwithstanding liberal acts, including the act providing for preemptions which was availed of in our State very largely, notwithstanding the desert-land entry act, about half of the lands in the State of Colorado to-day are not in private ownership; they are in public ownership, either reserved or unreserved. Notwithstanding all these liberal laws 60 years have passed since settlement began in Colorado and yet not more than one-half of these lands have been taken for settlement.

Mr. President, we know that public ownership has been a hardship upon these States. We know that the payment of taxes upon land for 30 years with a reasonable interest upon each yearly payment is equal to the value of the land. That being the case it requires the State, as a matter of fact, in maintaining forms of government over those reserved areas, to pay for these lands indirectly every 30 years. Colorado has been organized as a Territory and a State for 60 years and has practically paid for the public lands twice, not to the Government but in the fact that we have not been able to avail ourselves of the taxing power for State, county, and school purposes.

Under those circumstances it seems to me that it is unfair for the National Government to hold these lands exempt from taxation forever and not permit them to be liberally taken up as homesteads in the various States of the West.

We have a situation as to this matter that is an emergency condition at the present time. There is a report here from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the effect that there are 50,000 people who have made applications for homestead entries under the 640-acre act, and yet have not been permitted to file them because of the fact that the lands have not been classified. The Department of the Interior says it has no funds for that purpose. That may be; I am not blaming them; but there are 50,000 men, and I heard it recently stated because that report was a short time back that there are 60,000 homesteaders on the lands without the right to cultivate them, without the right to build a house upon them unless they take the chances of losing it entirely, living, as it were, on the ground and in wagons.

Mr. President, that is an emergency, and in view of the shortage in crops, in view of the high prices of everything that can be eaten by man or animals, it does seem to me there ought to be a most liberal opportunity given for the purpose of taking up these homesteads.

It is true that under the 640-acre act not much of it can probably be planted in the cereals, but it can to a large extent be used in the raising of live stock and resultant dairy products, and on that account we ought to have this liberal law, so that this great area in the West can be populated and homes made for the people who may live there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator a question. First, a parliamentary inquiry. I have been absent. Is the Senate now operating under a restricted rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. One speech and 10 minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. In my own time I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not acquainted myself thoroughly with the amendment which is proposed. As the Senator knows, I have entertained liberal views as to the public lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very liberal; and we have had great encouragement in the West from the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator object to explaining to me precisely in what respect the proposition now before the Senate changes the existing law? Did we not extend the homestead to 640 acres by somewhat recent legislation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes. The amendment which has been offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], as originally introduced by him, provided that the 640-acre homestead law which was passed in the Sixty-fourth Congress should apply to the lands of New Mexico without the designation required by the act; in other words, under the 640-acre homestead act it was provided that the Secretary of the Interior should classify the lands, and not have subject to the act lands which contain merchantable timber or lands that are susceptible of irrigation. It is now the contention of the Senator from New Mexico, and my contention also, that as to Colorado and New Mexico practically all of the land that is left is not that which contains any valuable timber or which can be irrigated without enormous expense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, all that I shall require, so far as my vote is concerned on this proposition, is to be assured of the correctness of the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Colorado that the law will not apply to valuable timberland. If it be true that these lands have been practically denuded of timber, I shall be very glad, indeed, to give my vote for the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from New Hampshire that the act can not apply to timberlands, because the Government for the last 20 years has been reserving the timberlands. The Senator no doubt has heard our protest against it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are over 14,000,000 acres of timberlands now reserved by the Government, and by reason of that fact there can be no question in my mind that there is not an acre of land growing a stick of timber which is merchantable which can be taken up under this 640-acre act.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope that if this amendment is adopted it will add something to the agricultural productiveness of the country in this emergency, and I certainly trust that it may be agreed to by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to insert the names "Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, that amendment, I understood, was accepted by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]; and, if agreeable to the Senator from New Mexico, I desire to offer an amendment to include the State of Arizona. I have had a talk over the telephone with the Senator from that State [Mr. SMITH], and he says that by all means he wants that State included. I therefore ask that it be included. If it requires a separate amendment to accomplish that object, I shall be glad to offer it, and I now offer the amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has asked whether an amendment including Arizona would be acceptable to me. I stated my position on yesterday. I know the conditions in New Mexico, and I undertook to speak for the conditions in New Mexico. Other Senators have referred to other States. I should have included Arizona with pleasure, for identical conditions exist there as in New Mexico, and I had discussed the matter with both Senators from Arizona; but those Senators being absent, I did not assume to include Arizona, and simply proposed to include New Mexico. It is now up to the Senators from the other States.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I feel, after having consulted the Senator from Arizona, and knowing the conditions of that State as I do, that I am justified in proposing to include it.

Mr. FALL. I accept the proposition, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. Then I move an amendment that Arizona be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 2, after the name "New Mexico," it is proposed to insert a comma and the name "Arizona," so that it will read:

> New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota.

Also, in line 9, after the name "New Mexico," it is proposed to insert "Arizona," so that it will read:

> New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I address myself to the amendment simply to say that I discovered by comparison of the report of the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1915 with the report for the year 1916 that we disposed of in that one fiscal year 2,327,987 acres of land in the State of Colorado; that is to say, if I may address myself to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that under existing law we are disposing of lands in the State of Colorado at the rate of nearly 2,500,000 acres per year, and as the Senator from New Hampshire interrogated the Senator from Colorado concerning the change in the law, I may say that, under the existing law, homesteads may be made to the extent of 320 acres; also under an act recently passed, lands that are not valuable for agricultural purposes, that can not be cultivated for crops, but are valuable only for grazing purposes—the rocky, hilly lands—they have permitted lands of that kind to be appropriated in blocks of 540 acres. The purpose of this amendment is to permit all lands in those four States to be entered in blocks of 640 acres.

Mr. MYERS. In five States now.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; in five States now. The view taken by those of us who are unable to give our assent to the amendment is that it will not result in increased production, but will result in decreased production; that is to say, one man alone will take up 640 acres, should the amendment be adopted, that otherwise would give an opportunity to two families, provided the land is of such character as that one family can make a living on 320 acres.

Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire was not in the Chamber yesterday when I disclosed that last year there were in the State of Montana 14,000 people who thus availed themselves of the 320-acre homestead act; there were 11,000 in the State of Colorado; and 7,000 in the State of New Mexico; that is to say, there are still lands in those States of such value which are open to appropriation under the 320-acre homestead act that 14,000 people went out and took lands in our State, 11,000 took lands in the State of Colorado, and 7,000 took lands in the State of New Mexico. Accordingly, it seems to me a necessary deduction from that that there is no occasion for now increasing the size of the homestead, which, as a matter of course, divides by two the number who will be able to avail themselves of the provisions of the proposed law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that it is a matter of regret to me that I did not hear his observations on yesterday. The Senator is doubtless aware of the fact that the Committee on Finance, of which I chance to be a member, has been kept very diligently at work on the revenue bill. The result has been that Senators so engaged have of necessity missed these most interesting discussions of public measures. That has been a matter of very deep regret to me, but I particularly am sorry that I did not hear the Senator from Montana discuss this very important question.

Mr. WALSH. We are all aware of the fact that whenever the Senator from New Hampshire is not here it is by reason of imperative duty that takes him elsewhere.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator fear, as I do, that this proposed law will be made a vehicle for the cattlemen to secure a lot of grazing land and so to monopolize that class of land? We know how the stone and timber law was used by the lumbermen to accumulate large quantities of timberland. Is it not likely that under this proposed law the cattlemen will secure large tracts of land for grazing purposes that might ultimately be fit for cultivation?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that when the 640-acre homestead law was under consideration I had a number of communications from Hon. Paris Gibson, who was long known to the Senator from Minnesota, and at one time a Senator from my State, and as well-informed a man on the subject of the public lands as there is in the Union. He took the view that it would simply be utilized as a means of securing great tracts of land by those who desired to acquire the public lands corruptly. I am not so apprehensive about that myself, although it must be admitted that the larger we make the unit the greater is the temptation to acquire lands corruptly.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to say in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the fact that the most vigorous opponents of the 640-acre homestead law in the first instance were the cattlemen ought to show that they are not favorable to this legislation. It will not suit their particular purpose. They were the ones who opposed the 640-acre homestead law when it was being considered by the Committee on Public Lands and were about the only ones who did oppose it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I should be very glad to contribute something along that same line. The Senator from South Dakota is quite right about that. The National Live Stock Association took the position that entries could be made under this act by people who really never intended to utilize the land, but would simply use it for the purpose of exacting something in the nature of blackmail from the cattlemen who had theretofore been utilizing the land.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word or two more while I have the floor. The Senator from Montana has alluded to the number of entries that have been made under existing laws under the original 160-acre homestead law and under the 320-acre homestead law. Of course, the Senator realizes the desire of men to own and possess land. The prospect of getting a Government homestead, whether 160 acres under the original law or 320 acres under the enlarged-homestead act, was alluring to the settler; and, without just consideration of the conditions in the semiarid region and the poor prospect of successfully farming that kind of land, of course great numbers of entries were made in all the States in which there are semiarid lands. That largely accounts for the vast number of entries.

I know how it was in my own State of South Dakota. When the Standing Rock and the Cheyenne River Indian Reservations were opened up, there was, first, the Government to boom these lands by having them appraised at from $2.50 to $6 an acre; so that, instead of a free homestead, the homesteader was literally buying his land. I might say here, in passing, that the Government would have been performing a splendid service had it informed prospective settlers and homesteaders of the actual conditions, of the amount of rainfall there, and so forth—a service which the Government seemingly took no pains to render. Then, in addition to the Government, there were the railroads all the while carrying on an advertising campaign and, for the sake of business for the railroads, inviting settlement. And then, in addition to the railroads, there were the land agents, persistent and energetic, everywhere booming these lands. All this induced settlement under conditions and upon lands on which the settlers could not make a living, either on 160 acres or even on 320 acres. The land, although apparently fair to look upon, being generally level and appearing as if it might be made easily subject to the plow and cultivation, yet, after all, is grazing land, properly speaking. After the reservations of which I speak were opened up and had been settled, there were four successive absolute crop failures. That is the situation in western South Dakota, and it is the situation with reference to the remaining unreserved and unappropriated lands on other Indian reservations there. It simply demonstrates that good as many of these lands may be for grazing they are not adapted to successful crop raising.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] reminds me that a comparatively small percentage of these entries are ever taken to final patent. I know how it has been in South Dakota. After trying to make a living on 160 acres for a year, or two or three years, much of the land has been abandoned.

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to one short paragraph in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which is quite applicable to this debate. He has been discussing the Kinkaid homestead act as it applies in Nebraska and adds this paragraph:

> The final deduction from the entire study of this subject is justified that the enlargement of the homestead was a timely recognition that the area of the entry should be measured by the earning capacity of the land. In operation the enlargement of the homestead entry to 320 acres may be recognized as a successful demonstration of this theory in that portion of the country where stock raising may be successfully united with dry farming, but not so in those communities where only cattle grazing is a profitable use of semiarid, non-irrigable land.

I think the Commissioner of the General Land Office has expressed the exact truth in that paragraph.

The unentered lands I have described, and which have not been designated, are not lands adaptable equally to grazing and to farming. They are lands that are adaptable to grazing only.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is an amendment pending on which I have not spoken, and I desire to say a few words in answer to suggestions which have been made.

Mr. KENYON. I make the point of order that the Senator has spoken once.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; not on the pending amendment. I moved an amendment to include Arizona, and I have not said a word since that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was of the impression that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] accepted the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; he said that, so far as he was concerned, he was not opposed to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is as far as he has to go, to say that he is satisfied with it. The Chair does not care anything about this matter, but, if the unanimous-consent agreement amounts to anything, the Senator from New Mexico did accept the amendment, and Senators have been speaking this morning in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment known as the Fall amendment, as modified.

Mr. HUSTING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see the Senator in the Chamber, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I am advised that the Senator from New York is absent, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

I also wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] on official business. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Alabama to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

So Mr. FALL's amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill as a new section the following:

SEC. —. Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended, and all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding such food products now and hereafter made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations, by the members thereof, are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities in good faith for actual future delivery and where the products are to be delivered instead of settled for as is usual in speculative trades.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment just offered is the one which, in final shape, I offered to the espionage bill early in the month of May. Since that time the subject has been discussed at considerable length by Senators in connection with other proposed legislation. I had intended to make an attempt at reply to some of the arguments presented against this proposition when it should be introduced as an amendment to the pending bill; but in view of the action of the Senate yesterday, which limits discussion of all proposed amendments and of the bill itself to 10 minutes, it is impossible for me to do so, and therefore I shall not even make the attempt. I think, however, that the obvious importance of a measure of this sort in connection with this bill is such as to make it unnecessary to use any part of my time in referring to that feature of it.

Some time between the 5th and the 15th of May the subject to which I have referred was first presented to the attention of the Senate. Upon a yea-and-nay vote the amendment was overwhelmingly defeated; but it was known that the subject had not been disposed of, and that it would be considered in connection with this and similar schemes of legislation so long as it was a question of vital importance.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that very shortly after the vote to which I refer was taken the Chicago Board of Trade—which is the leading institution to be affected by this amendment if it should become the law—suspended the practice of dealing in futures and advised similar action on the part of similar organizations throughout the country. The Associated Press on May 15 gave the public this information:

CHICAGO, May 15.

Representatives of the leading grain exchanges of the country at a meeting here to-day recommended to their respective exchanges that they continue until further notice the restrictive regulations which were put in effect yesterday.

The directors of the Chicago Board of Trade to-day extended until further notice the regulations covering dealing in futures which were put into effect yesterday.

CHICAGO, May 15.

A sentiment was manifest on the Chicago Board of Trade to-day that the action yesterday of the board of directors of the organization in forbidding further trading in May corn and oats and suspending for two days all purchases of wheat, except for the liquidation of existing contracts, was but the forerunner of more drastic steps to be undertaken to curb speculation in grains.

Delegates from the grain exchanges of St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, Minneapolis, Duluth, and Toledo are expected to meet here late to-day with the board of directors of the Chicago board to discuss the situation in an attempt to evolve a plan for concerted action by all the grain markets of the country. It was admitted that, with the high prices of grains, the runaway tendency of the market and the national emergency, some radical action is necessary.

MAY BAR ALL FUTURES.

A possibility that this might take the form of orders eliminating all speculation in futures, either stopping such trading entirely or by fixing maximum prices to be adjusted as the market requires, also was admitted. Other extraordinary steps which it was said unofficially the conference will be asked to consider are the advisability of establishing maximum prices on July and September corn and uniformity of action in demanding excessive margins to the end that the purely speculative elements can be eliminated from the market.

What was said to be an informal meeting of representatives of the various grain boards was held this forenoon. Those reported present included David Anderson and Frank I. King, Toledo; two representatives each from Kansas City and Duluth, five from St. Louis, three from Minneapolis, and President Griffin and directors of the Chicago Board of Trade.

There was no business in the wheat pit meanwhile, save that memberships were being hawked about. These sold at the height of the activity of the market last winter as high as $7,600. One man who had three for sale to-day for friends said that he had offered them at $4,000 without takers.

COOPERATING WITH GOVERNMENT.

Secretary Merrill, of the board of trade, asserted that the grain men have been cooperating with the Federal Government.

"We have a committee of six in Washington," he said, "who have opened headquarters and have tendered their offices to the Government.

"The committee consists of Julius Barnes, of New York and Duluth, the Nation's largest exporter; Robert McDougal, of Chicago; F. B. Wells, of Minneapolis; D. F. Piazzek, of Kansas City; Alfred Brandeis, of Louisville; and W. F. Hauser, of Portland, Oreg."

The curtailment of speculation ordered by the board of trade yesterday resulted in further price recessions in early grain trades to-day. July wheat sold off 11 cents to $2.48 and September 8 cents to $2.20. Corn dropped from 2½ to 3½ cents and oats from 1 to 1½ cents. The meeting here of delegations from leading grain exchanges was scheduled for 3 p. m. to-day.

Two days afterwards this telegram appeared in the newspapers:

CHICAGO, May 17.

Wheat continued to fall on the Chicago Board of Trade to-day, early losses being 8 to 10 cents. July opened 9 cents under yesterday's close, at $2.21, and half an hour later had lost another cent. September was down 7 cents, at $2, and later went to $1.99.

Flour prices were on the decline together with various other foodstuffs, and families that had stored away huge quantities of provisions in fear of a "famine" face the prospect of eating maximum priced food for the next several months while their neighbors enjoy cheaper commodities.

Flour, which soared to $17.60 wholesale only two days ago, has dropped to $16. One or two local millers, it was reported to-day, had even offered best grades as low as $15.50.

Dealers in all commodities said to-day that the outlook for lower prices is more optimistic than in months, while Mr. Ultimate Consumer began to lose a little of that worried look.

Various reasons were assigned for the marked decline in wheat prices, with the resultant drop in flour. The "trade" said it was due to farmers "loosening up" on their wheat holdings. The man on the street had an idea that the curbing of speculation had something to do with it.

It is quite probable, Mr. President, that both the causes there assigned had something to do with the fall; but the significant fact is that, through the apprehension consequent upon public discussion, these boards of trade, anticipating legislation and evidently desirous of avoiding it, assumed voluntarily to take the course which this legislation was designed to compel them to take, and that the immediate consequence of this voluntary action was a reduction in the price of the subject matter of these contracts, to the benefit of the public, thus emphasizing the soundness of the attitude which the advocates of this amendment assume, and which ascribes a part, at least, of the inordinate price of the necessities of life to the speculation so rife upon these exchanges in connection with futures.

Let me say, Mr. President, that this amendment does not in any wise interfere with the making of those contracts which Senators say are necessary for the protection of legitimate business, but the making of which is doubtless due to the existence of this gambling feature of the most of these exchanges; for without that feature the fluctuations to which I called attention the other day would be practically impossible. They would be confined to a smaller range and they would take place with much less frequency.

In this connection, Mr. President—my remarks, of course, are not and can not be systematic, in view of the shortness of my time—I want to read an article from a paper called the Censor, published, I think, in Chicago, and dealing with this identical question. The article is as follows:

Ostensibly the business of the Chicago Board of Trade is dealing in grain, provisions, and other commodities. In reality the business is all of the traditional "blue sky" variety—scarcely one whit different from the notorious "blue sky" trading of one sort and another that has been prohibited by law in many States. Of course, not once in a blue moon does a single bushel of wheat or other grain or a single pound of meat or other commodity figure in any of the so-called business deals. In fact, as I have heard it put, "not one in a thousand of those who put money into the bottomless bag of the Forty Thieves would know a grain of wheat if they should happen to meet it in the public road." There was a certain gentleman in St. Louis who got on the wrong side of the market in a deal and found himself several hundred dollars to the bad on his margins. It happened that he had a little capital and he backed himself up by refusing to sacrifice what he had ventured, but demanded that the actual wheat be delivered to him. He insisted that the actual wheat be produced and delivered and that he be given the opportunity of buying and paying for the actual grain instead of mere wind and chalk marks. The St. Louis agency had to get and deliver the wheat, and it was a matter of more trouble to them than anything against which they had bumped in all their business experience. It was the first time, the agent said, in all his experience that he ever had to actually buy and deliver grain. Think of that! Yet the books and the blackboards of this agent show purchases and sales of many, many thousands of bushels of wheat, corn, oats, and other grain; many, many barrels of pork, pounds of other meats, lard, etc. Then why does this Government license and tolerate such a gambling hell as the Chicago Board of Trade?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH. As the Senator from Colorado has stated, the proposition embodied in his amendment was heretofore submitted to the Senate and by the Senate rejected. It has all the features of a perfectly independent proposition. The rule seems to be quite well established that when a bill is formally brought before the Senate and is by the Senate rejected the introduction of another bill during that session of Congress covering identically the same subject is not in order. I inquire of the Chair whether the rule is applicable to amendments?

Mr. THOMAS. If there is such a rule, the sooner we repeal it the better. I never heard of such a proposition before.

Mr. WALSH. I may say——

Mr. THOMAS. I do not pretend to any knowledge of parliamentary procedure here, but it is very much like the application of the doctrine of res adjudicata, and it has no place here.

Mr. WALSH. I present the matter, I may say to the Chair, simply because it is not at all unlikely that many of the propositions, having been once considered by the Senate and having been disposed of and rejected, will come up again in connection with other measures. If the rule itself is sound I can see no reason why it should not apply to a proposition of this character. It is not in the nature of an amendment addressed to any existing feature of the bill, but endeavors to engraft on the bill what is substantially an independent proposition as though it were presented to the Senate as a totally separate measure.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator takes his seat, will he cite the rule which he invokes?

Mr. WALSH. I find it difficult——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like the Senator from Montana to direct the attention of the Chair to a rule which provides that a bill once considered adversely by the Senate can not be again introduced and considered at the same session of Congress. Probably that is laid down in Jefferson's Manual, but it has not been adopted as a rule of the Senate. However, it appears to the Chair that this question does not present that issue. Here is an amendment introduced that has been heretofore introduced to a similar bill, and though there was a rule which provided that you could not consider a bill which had been once determined by the Senate adversely it would not apply to an amendment which had been likewise determined by the Senate on some other bill, because the Senate might refuse to adopt an amendment to a bill for the reason that it did not think it was germane when on another bill it might be considered that it was a proper place for the adoption of such an amendment.

The Chair will therefore hold that the amendment is in order.

Mr. WALSH. I have no other interest in the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a moment before the vote is finally taken. I wish to call the attention of Senators to what, to my mind, is quite a remarkable article published in one of the food journals by the Secretary of Agriculture in April just passed, in which the Secretary reviews the food conditions in the country and tells what he knows about it. This article was placed by me in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 2913, and in view of the food legislation that we now have and that which is to come, I recommend that Senators look into the article. I have not time in the limited time I have this morning to discuss it at length. I can only say that the Secretary shows that we have a greater abundance of meats, of fish, of eggs, milk, cheese, o fcorn, of barley, of oats, and of every other food product, except alone wheat, and he goes on to show that we had a very large quantity of wheat brought over from the preceding year, which was the banner year in the history of this country in the production of wheat. It is to my mind a most enlightening article, and I commend it to the Senators.

I have this in mind on this amendment. The bill which is under discussion has some very good things. A food survey is all right, and we authorize the expenditure of a large sum of money for a food survey. A great many clerks are to be employed and others sent out to finish the survey, but, after all, a food survey does not amount to much. The Secretary of Agriculture has already given us that. It is about what the Secretary of Agriculture already has.

There are various other provisions which do not amount to much, except some that have been offered as amendments in this body. The amendment of the Senator from Montana about the storage of food is a very important amendment and the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] opening up public lands for farming purposes is an important amendment, but these amendments are about all there is in the bill. The main body of the bill as reported here merely provides for large expenditures in the Department of Agriculture and puts on the pay rolls of the Government a large body of additional employees.

As it appears to me, there are two vitally necessary things for this Congress to do on the food question. One is to stop food gambling and the other is to see to it that the country has the necessary transportation, so that all farm products can be carried to the consumers of our country, and after they have had enough to give to our allies in Europe. Those are the two vital propositions in the food question as I see it.

I know when the question of stopping food gambling was up a short time ago on the espionage bill many excellent gentlemen, many men who have claimed that they were the farmers' friends and the friends of the people, said: "Oh, yes; we are in favor of stopping this gambling in food products; we are in favor of wiping it out; we despise food gamblers," and yet some of those very gentlemen who made speeches on that side, I recall one distinctly, voted to lay the amendment of my distinguished friend from Colorado on the table and thereby permit the food gambling to go on just the same as before. They claimed then that the food amendment ought not to be put into the bill because that was not the bill for it; that that was not the time; that it ought not to be in an espionage bill; it ought to be in a food bill. In the minds of some it seems that it is never the time and never the bill in which to do away with food gambling. But we have the food bill up now. What are these gentlemen going to say about it at this time? What excuse are these friends of the farmers, the producers, and the consumers going to get up now? How are they going to avoid a direct vote? This is just the simplest proposition in the world. Food gambling does not do the producer of foods any good. The great farming interests of the country are not benefited by the establishment of food gambling houses, and surely every consumer in the country, and all of us are consumers, are damaged by it.

There is just one thing it seems to me to do. It does look to me that it is such a plain proposition a blind man could see it. Every person in the whole country except Congressmen see it. There is hardly an individual in the whole country who does not want Congress to stop food gambling. The press wants us to stop it. The people want us to stop it. We ourselves want to stop it. We must know that it is our duty to stop it. Are we afraid of the food gamblers? Here is the opportunity to do our full duty by our country. The time is now. Everyone knows the issue. There is no way to misunderstand it. The chance, and perhaps our one chance, is in this bill. It is a food-regulation bill. All we have to do is to cast our votes to-day for this splendid amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. It has been gone over time and time again by various Senators here. It is an amendment that will stop food gambling, and it does not interfere in the slightest with the legitimate operations of exchanges in our country. As the distinguished Senator from Colorado said a while ago, one of the leading—I believe the leading—exchanges so recognized the merits of this bill that it put this proposed law into force itself. If gamblers themselves are seeing the merits of this legislation, is it not time the Senate shall see it? Is it not time we were seeing it? If we can not see it, I believe the American people ought to force us to see it. This amendment, carefully prepared, proposes to do the very work that we all say we want to do; and I do not want to put it off.

If this amendment was passed and we were to furnish necessary transportation to the country, we would not need any food dictator. The Secretary of Agriculture says that we do not need any food dictator. I do not think we would need any other food legislation if we just pass this amendment prohibiting food gambling, and then follow it up by a proper measure providing for transportation in this country, so that our farm products may be carried to the consumers throughout our entire country and then be carried abroad afterwards.

Those are the two ideas that are in my mind on this subject and which I want to impress, if I may, upon Senators here. Let us stop food gambling to-day. There is not a Senator in this Chamber, in my humble judgment, who down in his heart and in his mind does not know that it is his duty to vote against food gambling at this time in this serious crisis in the affairs of the Republic. I hope every Senator will see it that way and think about it as I do. If so, we will stop food gambling and we will take the longest step that has ever been taken by Congress in the interest of the producers and consumers of the United States. There never was such an opportunity to serve the just interests of the many as opposed to the selfish interests of the few food gamblers who are now, in this great crisis of our country's history, sapping the national life blood.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this subject has been discussed fairly often in the Senate, and it is not necessary for me to take time to go into it at length. In fact, the rule would prevent me from taking more than 10 minutes of time in any event. I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to the effect which I am confident would be felt by the farmers of the country if this amendment were adopted. I have not the slightest personal interest or concern in any exchange, grain exchange, stock exchange, or any other sort of exchange, but I have very great interest in the prosperity of the people who raise the food of the United States and who must be depended upon for some years to come to carry a very heavy burden with respect to the production of food for ourselves and for our allies.

As I read this amendment, even with the proviso which is now added at its end, it will be impossible or illegal in the future for a miller, we will say, who desires to purchase wheat for future delivery to hedge against that contract. The miller, through his broker upon a grain exchange, purchases for future delivery, we will say, 50,000 bushels of wheat. He may place that order in the month of June. Wheat is not then ripe, and really is not even in existence. The contract may call for the delivery of that wheat in October. The price is fixed in the contract. The miller who makes that contract to receive the wheat at a certain price must find some way to insure himself against the lowering of the price of that wheat in the interim; for if he purchases the wheat for future delivery, we will say, on October 1 at $2 a bushel and by the time October 1 comes around the wheat has gone down to $1.50 a bushel, his milling competitor can purchase wheat so much more cheaply that he can undersell the first miller in the market with his flour and put him out of business.

So through an evolution extending over many years, as I understand it, the miller who purchases wheat for future delivery insures himself against any drastic change in the price which would make it impossible for him to do successful business by hedging against that contract, the hedging being in the nature of a sale of future; so that, no matter which way the market has gone in the interim, when October 1 arrives the miller has insured himself. If the market price of wheat has gone down, his sale of the future compensates him for what he otherwise would have lost had he not insured himself.

As I read it, this amendment of the Senator from Colorado will make it illegal for any man who purchases wheat or any other food product in perfect good faith for future delivery to insure himself against loss by the selling of futures.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does not the amendment go further and prohibit a man buying anything in grain to be delivered in the future, whether it is a hedge or whether it is an actual purchase?

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I read the proviso at the end of the proposed amendment, there is nothing that would prohibit a man making a contract to purchase grain for future delivery, an actual bona fide transaction.

Mr. REED. My attention had not been called to the proviso.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But he is forbidden to insure himself in the ordinary economic method against loss on the day when he must accept that wheat. Now, what is going to be the result? The result will be that millers and other men who find it necessary for the successful conduct of their business to buy their supplies ahead of time will hesitate in doing it in the markets of the country, and you will find, as has been found on many another occasion where markets of this sort have been artificially interfered with and the right denied to a man to insure himself as I have described, the price of the article will go down and down to the farmer, who will be compelled in the very nature of the case to carry the entire risk of the business. Every other man engaged in the wheat business, as I look at it, if this amendment is adopted, will be forbidden to insure himself against the risks of the business, and it is impossible to get an insurance company to insure a miller against a fall in the price of the product. The result will be that the farmer who raises the wheat must carry all the risk of the business, and that means that he will be compelled to sell his product on the farm at such a low figure that there is not any risk left for any of the other people who operate in that business.

I remind the Senate that when the cotton exchanges were closed at about the beginning of the European war, and by that closing it was impossible for the manufacturers who purchased cotton to insure themselves by this hedging against their contracts, the burden of the entire cotton business was thrown back upon the shoulders of the cotton raiser and cotton went down to 6 cents a pound, a price at which it could not be raised with any degree of profit whatever.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not a fact that the cotton exchange closed because it knew nothing about the cotton market, and was afraid to deal in cotton at all?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not commenting as to why the cotton exchange closed, but I am reciting one of the results of its closing. Probably for the moment it was a wise thing for it to close.

Mr. KIRBY. Is it not a fact, however, that the closing of the cotton exchange had nothing to do with the price of cotton, but that it was affected by war conditions?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not concede that much, Mr. President. I think the closing of the cotton exchange made the cotton market stagnant. You can not keep a staple article running through the channels of commerce unless you have an open market; and when the great exchanges close down of course the price of that article goes down, down, down, for every man engaged in the business is trying to shift the burden of the risk to the man who originally raised the product, whether it be cotton or wheat. I anticipate that, if this amendment of the Senator from Colorado becomes a part of the statutes of the United States, not only will wheat continue to go down in price, as it is going down now, but it will eventually go down to a point at which the farmer will not raise it for the year 1918. That is what I am looking forward to. If you cramp and stagnate the wheat market and throw the entire burden of the risk upon the man who raises the wheat, he will not plant it in the fall of 1917 or in the spring of 1918.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, theoretically the argument of the Senator from New York seems very plausible, but I want to call his attention to the cold facts to show how little help the farmers get from the system of dealing in futures. Our farmers, as a rule, are obliged shortly after they do their thrashing to sell most of the grain in order to pay their hired help and other expenses. The result is that most of their wheat is put into the market in the fall and in the early part of the winter. The Northwestern farmers, in the spring-wheat States, disposed of most of their wheat last fall and in the early part of the winter. I venture to say that over 80 per cent of it, perhaps 90 per cent of it, was then disposed of. The average price they received was only from $1.40 to $1.50 a bushel. But, now, what occurs? Let us look the cold facts in the face.

After the April report of the Agricultural Department came out, estimating an immense shortage in the winter-wheat belt, and after its report came out on the 1st of May, estimating still a great shortage, the speculators of the country made use of that in connection with the agitation which transpired in Congress to raise the price of wheat for which the farmers had only received from $1.40 to $1.50 a bushel up to $3.25 and $3.30 a bushel. The situation got so bad that it even shamed the members of the Chicago Stock Exchange so that they suspended operations. That is what brought the price of wheat down.

The seat of the speculation in wheat was in the grain exchanges. They have the power to regulate the price. That was illustrated in the recent act of the Chicago exchange, and I believe it is still in force. They have a right in their own midst to regulate this matter, as they have attempted to do at Chicago, and that has brought the price of wheat down.

I read from the Commercial West, a grain and milling paper, from its issue of May 26, the last issue that I have, the following:

Grain trading still continues under "martial law"—

Listen to that—

and thus far there appears no immediate prospect of resumption of free grain markets. The buying of wheat futures continues limited to liquidation of contracts, and selling is unrestricted, so long as it is below the maximum price reported in our issue of May 19. With grain exchanges on the restricted basis, wheat prices naturally have declined from the maximum levels.

The result of that action of the grain exchange was to reduce the price of wheat 50 to 60 cents a bushel, until wheat is now selling at a reasonable figure. What was the effect of that extraordinary rise? The millers, as soon as wheat rose to $3.25 a bushel, increased the price of their flour by $2 a barrel—from fourteen to sixteen dollars a barrel. All that increase inured to the benefit of the speculators and to the benefit of the millers; the farmers got none of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I have only 10 minutes, or I would yield to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota declines to yield.

Mr. NELSON. The action of the Agricultural Department was founded on a misapprehension. Let me read further:

The eyes of all interested in grain are now turned toward the winter-wheat belt, where conditions have shown radical improvement in the past fortnight. There has been plenty of rain, and warm weather is now the need throughout the winter-wheat belt. The improvement in winter-wheat prospects has been so marked—

Now, listen to these figures—

as to bring out estimates of a probable winter-wheat crop in excess of 460,000,000 bushels, compared with the Government's estimate of 366,000,000 bushels, based on May 1 conditions.

In other words, we are likely now to have 100,000,000 bushels more of winter wheat than the Agricultural Department estimated on the 1st of May. I read again from this same paper:

CHICAGO, May 22.

Greater sanity prevailed in the grain markets last week, and La Salle Street—

That is the place—

became more composed as a result of the drastic action taken by the Chicago Board of Trade. A settling price for May wheat at $3.18, May corn at $1.61½, and May oats at 73½ cents checked the pyrotechnical display in foodstuffs. * * * Compared with a week ago, wheat is off 29 and 35 cents—

And so forth.

This shows two things, Mr. President: First, that the seat of the speculation is in the grain exchanges; second, that the grain exchanges can themselves, if they see fit to do so, regulate the matter and check it, as they have done in Chicago. We do not know that they will always do what they did in Chicago, and therefore the Government ought to compel them, when such occasions occur, to do just what was done in Chicago; that is, check overspeculation. There was no sense in running up the price of wheat, for which the farmer got only $1.40 and $1.50 a bushel, to $3.25 and $3.30 a bushel, and increasing the price of flour from $12 to $14 a barrel and from $15 to $16 a barrel, as was done at the last bulge.

I have prepared an amendment, Mr. President, which, I think, will cover this matter, but I do not desire to get in the way of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. My amendment relates simply to grain exchanges, and is very simple and plain. It gives the grain exchanges themselves, in the first instance, an opportunity to right any wrong in this matter. The amendment I have prepared reads as follows:

SEC. —. Any building or room occupied or used by a board of trade, chamber of commerce, grain exchange, or otherwise, in which wheat or other food cereals are bought or sold for present or future delivery shall, for the purpose of this act, be known as a grain exchange.

All persons engaged in buying or selling, for present or future delivery, any wheat or other food cereal, in or about any such grain exchange, shall be known and designated as traders in grain.

All sales of wheat or other food cereals by such traders in such exchanges for future delivery, and not for present or immediate delivery, shall be known and designated as dealings in futures.

If at any time during the pendency of the existing war between the United States and the German Empire the President of the United States shall find that such dealings in futures, in or about any grain exchange, unduly, unreasonably, and in an unwarranted manner raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals, to the injury of the people of the United States—

Now, listen to this—

he may at once request the traders in such exchange to discontinue for a time specified by him all dealings in futures.

If the President finds these conditions to exist he can request the grain exchanges to do what they ought to do voluntarily, and what they did do in Chicago recently:

In case such request of the President is not promptly complied with then he is hereby empowered to order such dealings in futures, as last aforesaid, to be entirely suspended and discontinued for such limited time as he may direct, and if such order is not promptly complied with he is hereby empowered to close such grain exchange for the purpose of enforcing such order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has remarked privately, and I think I will make the remark for him publicly, that this bill is being treated as if it were a Christmas tree, on which everybody is entitled to hang anything he wants to hang. The difficulty I find with that particular kind of legislation is that it brings to the Senate a lot of undigested matter which has never been considered by a committee and which can not be properly considered or investigated here. That difficulty is accentuated when the proposition comes forward under the 10-minute rule of debate.

Mr. President, I believe there is connected with the grain exchanges all over the country certain great evils that ought to be not only arrested but stopped permanently. I believe, on the other hand, that the grain exchanges perform great economic functions that ought not to be interfered with, and I think any bill that is drawn and brought forward should, before it is passed, be submitted to a committee, hearings had, the truth elicited, and the legislation should be then enacted in the light of the investigation and developments.

Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the fact that his argument this morning is that the grain exchanges having been closed the result was a reduction in the price of wheat. That would seem to argue, therefore, that when the grain exchanges are closed the tendency is to destroy or lower the price of wheat.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator desire me to answer?

Mr. REED. In a moment, when I have completed my statement. If that is true as a general rule, then, of course, the tendency of closing the exchanges would be very adverse to the farmer, because the determination of the market price of wheat in Chicago or in any other of the great centers fixes the price of wheat to the farmer on whatever wheat he then has. So that if the closing of these exchanges has any such effect as that, certainly we ought to go very carefully about the business of closing them. I have completed that statement, and, although my time is limited, I will yield to the Senator if he desires to reply briefly.

Mr. NELSON. I would be glad to answer the Senator, but I do not desire to take his time.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, the Senator states that the great rise of recent date, which has been referred to, occurred after the farmer had parted with his wheat; and the Senator states, in substance, that the wheat was stored and that the same wheat the farmer got $1.40 for was sold for about $3. Mr. President, that is partly true, and partly it is a mistake. I showed the other day that the wheat that started at the farm at $1 a bushel went on through to the ultimate consumer at substantially the same price, and that the rise in the price of flour to the consumer and of wheat in the exchanges was carried right on back to the farmer.

Of course, the farmer did sell a large part of his wheat at $1.40 or less; but that wheat was disposed of and for the most part actually eaten up before the rise to $3 occurred in Chicago. Nine months of the wheat year had gone by; three-quarters of the time had elapsed; and three-quarters of the last year's grain crop was actually devoured and no longer existent. The probabilities are that much more than three-quarters of it had been eaten up. The rise in the price of the original crop of wheat occurred, therefore, when the wheat was neither in the granaries of the farmers nor in the elevators of the dealers. The rise occurred at a time when the wheat was largely gone, and it largely occurred because the wheat was gone; but whatever farmers there were in the United States who still had their wheat on hand obtained the benefit of that rise.

What was the occasion of that rise? I tried to go through that the other day, and I thought I found—and nobody challenged it—that the great cause of that rise, the principal cause of that rise, was two things: First, a world shortage, either actual or believed; and, second, not the dealing of speculators upon boards of trade, but the enormous purchases which were being made by the allies, which had forced the market up.

Mr. President, I very much more favor the provision the Senator from Minnesota read than the pending amendment; and in the moment that I have left I call attention to the fact that the language of this amendment does not even make sense. I challenge the Senators here to read the opening sentence and to see if they can make anything out of it. It reads as follows:

SEC. —. Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended.

I challenge anybody here to make any sense out of that statement. Surely there is a misprint. Surely there is something radically wrong with the language. It means nothing.

Mr. President, much could be said on this matter. I think the thing to do is to defeat this proposition, not to hang it onto this bill. Let this question go before a committee. Let them work out a proposition that will stop speculation, something along the line of the amendment the Senator from Minnesota read, if I grasped it correctly. I do not absolutely commit myself to it. Something along that line, I think, might be worked out. But this measure, if we adopt it and the President once puts it into effect, must remain in effect until the war is over. Even the President can not set it aside. Even the President can not lift the embargo if he has once declared it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This is a very important matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Myers	Sherman
Borah	Hollis	Nelson	Shields
Brady	Husting	Overman	Smoot
Brandegee	James	Page	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Swanson
Fall	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thomas
France	Kellogg	Pittman	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Poindexter	Underwood
Gallinger	Kirby	Ransdell	Vardaman
Hale	McCumber	Reed	Walsh
Harding	McKellar	Shafroth	Williams
Hardwick	Martin	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. NEW entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that it takes two roll calls to develop a quorum here now, and that evidently we are not very much occupied with the things before the Senate, and as this is one of the most important matters—I regard it as the most important matter—that will come before the Senate in connection with food conservation, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday morning.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator to withdraw that motion. We have been on this bill for over a week, and it is now 10 minutes to 2. The bill can be finished this afternoon. There are as many Senators here as are usually together in this Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent. A motion to adjourn is not debatable.

Mr. KENYON. I am appealing to the Senator from Arkansas to withdraw the motion.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado by inserting, after the word "ended," in the tenth line, the phrase "unless the President shall sooner, by order, set aside such suspension."

Mr. THOMAS. I accept that amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado if he is willing to substitute in lieu of the proviso which I drew and offered to his amendment the other day sitting in the Senate the one I send to the desk and ask to have read. I will say in explanation that the one I drew the other day was drawn rather hastily, and, in my judgment, the one I now present accomplishes the same thing. I have already submitted it to the Senator and asked that he accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair understand the situation. The Senator from Colorado accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course the Senator has a right to do that. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Minnesota offers the following amendment, to be inserted in lieu of the proviso on page 2, line 7:

Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities for future delivery where actual delivery is contemplated instead of settled for, as is usual in speculative trades.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator submitted that amendment to the Senator from Tennessee and myself, and it is satisfactory. We will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator accepts the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir. Now, Mr. President, before the vote is taken I want to perfect the amendment by inserting the word "is" before the word "engaged," in line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to do that. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado as modified.

Mr. FRANCE. I ask that the amendment be stated as it now reads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. —. Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress is engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended, unless the President shall sooner by order set aside such suspension; and all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding such food products now and hereafter made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations, by the members thereof, are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000; Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities for future delivery where actual delivery is contemplated instead of settled for as is usual in speculative trades.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado as modified.

Mr. KIRBY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we now about to vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Oh, no; that has been accepted by the Senator from Colorado. He has perfected the amendment by accepting an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, one offered by the Senator from Minnesota, and an amendment made by himself. The question now is on the amendment as perfected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to rule that the Senator from Missouri, having spoken once, under the unanimous-consent agreement, can not do so again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I spoke upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; but since he has accepted these amendments, they become part of his amendment.

Mr. REED. I am about to offer another amendment. I have it in my hand, and I desire to make an inquiry from the Senator from Minnesota before offering it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course if the Senator offers an amendment, he will have a right to speak to the amendment. The Chair thought he was going to speak on the pending amendment, on which he had already spoken.

Mr. REED. I do not intend to speak at all. I intend to make an inquiry.

I simply wanted to say this: I very much prefer the amendment read by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I ask him to offer it. If he does not offer it, I ask permission to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection. I felt a delicacy in offering it myself as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. It would seem as though I would be discourteous to him; but if the Senator from Missouri wants to offer the amendment, I am quite well satisfied.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Minnesota that I would be perfectly willing, so far as I am personally concerned, to have him offer any amendment or substitute which he thinks would be an improvement upon this, and I shall not regard it as at all discourteous. In fact, I do not think the Senator could be discourteous to me if he wanted to be.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, under those conditions, with the leave of the Senator from Missouri, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the entire amendment of the Senator from Colorado as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. —. Any building or room occupied or used by a board of trade, chamber of commerce, grain exchange, or otherwise, in which wheat or other food cereals are bought or sold for present or future delivery shall, for the purpose of this act, be known as a grain exchange.

All persons engaged in buying or selling, for present or future delivery, any wheat or other food cereal, in or about any such grain exchange, shall be known and designated as traders in grain.

All sales of wheat or other food cereals by such traders in such exchanges for future delivery, and not for present or immediate delivery, shall be known and designated as dealings in futures.

If at any time during the pendency of the existing war between the United States and the German Empire the President of the United States shall find that such dealings in futures, in or about any grain exchange, unduly, unreasonably, and in an unwarranted manner raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals, to the injury of the people of the United States, he may at once request the traders in such exchange to discontinue for a time specified by him all dealings in futures, where there is no actual delivery of the product sold. In case such request of the President is not promptly complied with then he is hereby empowered to order such dealings in futures, as last aforesaid, to be entirely suspended and discontinued for such limited time as he may direct, and if such order is not promptly complied with he is hereby empowered to close such grain exchange for the purpose of enforcing such order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, first I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Minnesota that they certainly both understand I did not mean any discourtesy.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Colorado understands it perfectly well.

Mr. REED. I now ask the attention of the Senator from Colorado, and the Senator from Minnesota also. I think this amendment in order to be within the power of Congress ought to be limited to transactions in interstate commerce or to concerns at least engaged in interstate commerce. I think our power to legislate on this matter depends upon our right to regulate interstate commerce, and I think the words "in interstate commerce" should be inserted in line 6, after the word "selling," so that it would read, "all persons engaged in buying or selling in interstate commerce for present or future delivery."

Mr. NELSON. I do not think that is necessary. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, the last part of the bill puts it under the war power. It is only during the pendency of the war that this can be done, and it comes under the war power.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me further, I hope he will let the amendment go in the bill, and then the conferees can elaborate and improve it.

Mr. REED. I would be forced to vote against the amendment unless those words are in, and for this reason: I hold that there is no such thing as war power in the sense that that term is now being employed. Congress has the power to declare war and to carry on war, but the power to declare war and to carry on war does not suspend the Constitution of the United States. It does not destroy the liberties of the American people. It does not annul the laws of the land. They all exist. I denounce as utterly un-American and abominable the doctrine declared in this Chamber a few days ago that in time of war Congress is not bound by the ordinary provisions of the Constitution. I declare that if such a doctrine be true, then the fathers wrought in vain and wrote upon the sand, instead of having inscribed upon the tablets of time and eternity the principles of human liberty.

The law in regard to this matter, I think, is reasonably plain. I have many authorities collated upon it. I have time only to state the conclusion which is this: That when war is declared every principle of the Constitution remains intact.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. REED. I have only a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. In my own time I wish to call attention to the very authorities the Senator refers to.

Mr. REED. Very well. There may come a condition, however, where the emergency is so great, so immediate, so pressing that for the time being the Government is authorized in disregarding the ordinary processes that are to be employed, but that danger must be there, it must be immediate, it must be overmastering and overpowering; and the instant it is lifted all the usual civil processes and civil rights must be employed. We are not in any such condition in this country.

Mr. President, I shall speak at some length on this proposition at the proper time, but I embrace this opportunity to protest once more against the doctrine being announced in the United States Senate that the law of the land has ceased, that the Constitution is dead because war has been declared with Germany, or, rather, to state it accurately, because Germany has been making war on us without our even having declared war upon Germany or having even declared that we will make war against her.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss this amendment, although I am opposed to both amendments. They are utterly beyond the power of Congress to enact. I desire to take issue here and now, as specifically as language can make it, with the statement just made by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Congress has no power except such as is conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States or can be necessarily inferred from such express power.

The Supreme Court of the United States in decision after decision, cited on this floor by the distinguished and brilliant Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day, has laid down the doctrine that Congress has no additional power and no different kind of power in time of war than it has in time of peace. The Milligan case, reported in Fourth Wallace, announced that doctrine as distinctly as human language can express it.

To contend that because, forsooth, we have declared war with another nation the organic law of this Republic has ceased to operate, that it no longer has binding force upon the Congress of the United States, is something that I never expected to hear made in this body. The power to make war is one of the express powers conferred upon Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the wording of the amendment. It specifically provides that business is to be interfered with only when such business is subject to the regulative power of Congress. It is directly constitutional under the very words of the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, this law is to be constitutional so far as it is constitutional.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; so far as it regulates trade between the States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Who is going to draw the line? The court?

Mr. McKELLAR. The court.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can not Congress do it? Has the time come when the Congress of the United States can no longer determine exactly how far it can go and how far it can not go? Has the time arrived when we can just say we will enact this law so far as it is constitutional and so far as it is not, it will not have any force and effect? Are we willing to commit ourselves to any such doctrine as that? I think not.

The power to regulate commerce between the States has been stretched outrageously within recent years. It has assumed proportions never dreamed of by the designers of the Constitution and that are destined, unless this movement is checked, to destroy the very form and structure of the Government and utterly abrogate the rights of the several States of the Union.

Under the power to regulate commerce between the several States of the Union we have no right to control production in all its processes before commerce in such products begins to move between the States. Under that power we have no right to say that we will control the anterior processes by which an article is produced because the article is ultimately destined to enter interstate commerce. To contend that that is what the interstate commerce clause means is to utterly subvert the very form of our Government and is utterly to deny to the several States and their people the blessings of local self-government and their right to control in their own way, in their own fashion, and according to their own will their several domestic and internal affairs.

It is impossible, as far as I am concerned, for me to support any proposition based either on a so-called war power of Congress or an indefinite, vague, impossible something which does not exist or that is based on a stretching of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to such an extent that when the whole result is considered the rights and liberties of the several States and their people will be gone.

Therefore I can not support the proposition and shall vote against it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Minnesota, who tendered the amendment, to the fact that the amendment as he proposed it does not designate how the President is to close the exchanges if his order is not complied with. The draft says he shall close the exchanges, but how is he to close them? I think the draft ought to be supplemented in some form. I have drafted hurriedly here what seems to me to be necessary to make the amendment complete. I would strike out all of line 17 after the word "he" and line 18 and insert, so that the concluding part would read as follows:

> And if such order is not promptly complied with he may, by proclamation, declare such exchange closed, and thereafter it shall be unlawful to utilize or permit to be utilized such building or room as a grain exchange or for any person being a trader in grain on such exchange to engage in the business theretofore conducted on or at such closed exchange. Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 and by imprisonment not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

I offer that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Montana that the amendment is not in order because it would be in the third degree. The Senator from Minnesota if he desires may perfect his amendment.

Mr. NELSON. For the purpose of having the matter incorporated in the bill and go into conference I accept that amendment as a part of my amendment.

Mr. REED. In order that matters may not become mixed, I will state that I have tendered an amendment which has not been acted upon, that after the word "selling," in line 6, there should be inserted the word "in interstate commerce."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state to the Senator from Missouri that his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota was not in order, because it was in the third degree, and the same ruling applies, of course, to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. It would not be in order unless the Senator from Minnesota accepted it in the way of perfecting his amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota is not an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, but is a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is absolutely a substitute and can be perfected by amendment before it is voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it can be perfected. The Chair ruled that that could be done.

Mr. NELSON. I am willing to have the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana treated as a part of my amendment. I modify my amendment to that extent. I did not understand what the Senator from Missouri was suggesting.

Mr. REED. I was suggesting, in order to make the bill, as I think, constitutional, so that it will stand in the courts, to put the words "in interstate commerce" after the word "selling," on the sixth line, so as to read "all persons engaged in buying or selling in interstate commerce, for present or future delivery, any wheat," and so forth. That would stop everything except local trading.

I want to suggest to the Presiding Officer, with all respect in the world for his ruling, that this is now offered as a complete substitute for the Thomas amendment. It seems to me we ought to be permitted to perfect it, as suggesed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and we can not do that unless we are permitted to offer amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota offered it as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. REED. As a substitute.

Mr. NELSON. I do not exactly understand the Senator. Did he include foreign and interstate commerce?

Mr. REED. I admit that I did not.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would do that.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. NELSON. Then I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as a part of my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. Let it all be treated as a part of my amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Minnesota has accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Yes. I want to state that as accepted it reads "in interstate or foreign commerce."

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to oppose the proposed substitute and to favor the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I regard it as the most important legislation that has come before this Congress outside of that of providing immediately for raising an army and for raising revenue. We talk about food conservation and the people have almost been frightened to death about conditions that are liable to obtain because of the war. We talk about a food dictator, and there is no word more distasteful and despicable to a true American who has the right sort of a view of conditions here than the word "dictator." We ought not to have any dictator of any kind in the United States, and will need no food dictator if the farmers are allowed to attend to their business of farming and the gambler in farm products is put out of business.

So far as I am concerned, and I say here and now, if we shall prohibit gambling in futures, buying up the price of grain and selling it down to the injury of the producer and consumer, we will have done more for the conservation of food in this country and for the protection of our people than can be done by any other sort of law we can pass.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado is well considered. It obviates the objection that is raised as to unconstitutionality by the Senator from Missouri because it does not apply to intrastate commerce but only to grain that is bought, sold, and shipped in interstate commerce, the dealing in which only can be regulated by Congress, as we all understand. That is provided for here.

The amendment as proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] does not correct the amendment altogether as offered by the Senator from Minnesota. Under the amendment as proposed by him all contracts whether to buy for future delivery—that is, where the grain is to be delivered at a future time—or for dealing in futures—where no delivery is contemplated—may be stopped. You can stop dealing in futures where it is an honest and perfectly good transaction. You will see in reading it over that dealing in futures whether there is to be an actual delivery or not is prohibited if the amendment as proposed is put into effect.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado only prohibits dealing in futures where there is no actual delivery contemplated at all, and where only gambling is indulged in for the benefit of speculators and which operates injuriously to the producer and the consumer.

The Senator from Missouri has said the intimation was made because the grain exchanges have abandoned this trading that the price has gone down somewhat. That was because that by gambling in futures they had created a fictitious value. They had bought up the price beyond where it ought to be, and it can be sold down below where it ought to be under the law of supply and demand. That was the trouble. They had created a fictitious price.

It seems to me the Congress of the United States ought to be able to realize that something should be done to prohibit gambling in futures when the grain exchanges themselves have recognized that fact and prohibited it for a time.

The time has come and the bill is here now and some of you avoided a vote on it the other day which would have placed it on another bill, the espionage bill, saying that it properly belonged on a bill for food conservation and regulation. Now the bill is here. Now the amendment is here, and if you are for it show down on it, and if you are not for it, say so, and do not evade or quibble about it longer.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have read the substitute of the Senator from Minnesota several times, as it was called to my attention very shortly after it was offered to the previous bill. I am unwilling to accept it as a substitute for the amendment which I propose, although it goes very largely in the same direction. There are, however, some defects as I view the substitute which compel me to prefer my own amendment.

In the first place, the operation of the law is confined to the occupants of rooms or buildings occupied or used by boards of trade, and so forth. We have curb exchanges in America, one of which is among the most important of the trade exchanges in the country, and it would seem that this provision could be evaded, or if the President exercised the authority which it confers upon him to exercise it could be defeated by merely adjourning the transactions to the street. We know enough of the ingenuity of men to realize how easy it would be to carry on the business at which the amendment is aimed and at the same time comply with the strict requirement of the law. I do not want to vote therefore for an amendment which merely provides for the adjournment of an institution from a building into the open air, or, if you please, from the building generally occupied and designated as the building of a particular association to some other even for a temporary purpose.

Another criticism to which I think the substitute is subject is, that it is confined to wheat or other food cereals. Some of these exchanges, notably the Chicago Exchange, deal in futures, as I am informed, upon animal food—to be more specific, upon pork and lard. There have been corners I think in both with the result of a large increase in the price of the commodities.

I think, therefore, if we are to regulate or attempt to regulate the subject at all, our regulations should be sufficiently comprehensive to comprise all the subjects which are the basis of the transaction.

These are, of course, the principal objections which occur to me in my consideration of the subject; but I do not think, if these practices should manifest themselves, as they doubtless will, because they have done it and were doing it up to the time of the voluntary suspension of that method of dealing by the exchange, the President of the United States should be required to request that the practices be refrained from before exercising his power to close them. I think if we are to invest the President with this power at all it should be of an arbitrary character, and that whenever he is convinced that the evil exists he should apply the drastic remedy of immediate closure instead of going through the process of requesting abstinence from the practice. A failure to comply with it should be recognized to be a valid closure, because if there is room for an evasion, opportunity will be taken of it, and it will largely result in minimizing if not destroying the power itself.

The amendment which I offer relates to all transactions which are carried on in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress. I can conceive that in time of war the regulating power of Congress would not be limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution; it would be far broader than that; and it ought to be far broader than that upon such occasions as we have entered upon, and it may be indefinitely prolonged. Consequently, if we are to invest the President with this authority, let it be so broad in its character that it will be subject to the regulating power of Congress in reference to all such transactions.

The criticisms which I have made may not be well founded. I think they are; and for the reasons which I have given I hope the substitute will be defeated and the amendment which I have offered be ingrafted upon the bill as a part of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should dislike very much to vote for the substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado for this reason: I think the substitute tends to validate what would be an illegal contract. Even in the State of Minnesota gambling, whether by futures or otherwise, if a gambling contract, is punished by the laws of the State of Minnesota exactly as it is punished by the laws of any other State, and if it has not been enforced as to purely gambling contracts effectuated upon boards of exchange it is simply because the State officials have not performed their duty.

I call attention to the second page, commencing with line 3 of the proposed substitute, which reads:

> If at any time during the pendency of the existing war between the United States and the German Empire the President of the United States shall find that such dealings in futures, in or about any grain exchange, unduly, unreasonably, and in an unwarranted manner raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals, to the injury of the people of the United States, he may, etc.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is open clearly to the objection that it seeks to validate what would otherwise be an invalid contract. The legality or illegality of it is to be determined upon the extent to which it affects the values of commodities to the people. That is a question which it is almost impossible to prove unless there would be an immense cornering in the markets or something of that character. No jury could determine what was the influence clearly that affected the price of the commodity, and I do not think that anyone could be convicted. In fact, I think there is no intention to convict under this bill of any offense, if it went to a jury; and I think it is equally impossible for the President or anyone else to say whether or not that contract in futures has materially affected the value of any product in the United States.

I wish to say most candidly, Mr. President, as representing a grain State, that I have not been frightened by what a great many of the people of my State seriously object to; and that is what is called the "hedging process." I think it is often quite necessary in order to cover present purchases to hedge against them in the future, where the product is not to be delivered until the future. Very little, if any, damage can come of that, while it affords opportunities for those purchasing in country elevators, where they are not able to sell immediately, or might not be able, because of the shortage of cars, to get their product to market in a given length of time to hedge against it so that they will not lose; and they may be able to carry on their hedging from day to day. That does not injure any one; but the mere gambling contract, the mere contract to sell or to buy a million or three million or five million bushels of grain which you do not own, and then, in order to be able to pinch your opponent, that you buy up all the grain or sell short and thereby make a great profit, is detrimental to business and is injurious to the people of the country. We seek to eliminate that, and that ought to be the limit.

But, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to what I believe to be more or less of a serious objection to the amendment which he proposes, beginning with the very beginning of the section which reads:

> Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products—

I confess I can get very little meaning out of the phrase "in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress." The regulative power of Congress is over interstate commerce and the products that enter into interstate commerce. I do not think we can extend it beyond that; and I am fearful that the language will be considered as having no force whatever, or if given any force that it will be considered by any court as bringing the subject within the constitutional prohibition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. Now, suppose that instead of the words "in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress" we insert the words "any products entering into interstate or foreign commerce," and then on the sixth line, instead of the language "through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products" we should say "in such food products." Those would be products which enter into interstate commerce. Practically all of this wheat, or nearly all of it—90 per cent of it at least—that is sold on the speculative market is grain which enters into interstate commerce. I am certainly fearful that the amendment itself would be held to be unconstitutional without that change.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the phrase which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] quotes was suggested by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] during the discussion of this amendment in connection with the espionage bill. It was designed to exclude from the operation of the proposed act such transactions as were strictly within the jurisdiction of the States. I accepted it because I then thought, and still think, that during times of war "the regulative power of Congress" may be more extensive in all probability than that conferred by the commerce clause of the Constitution. I am therefore inclined to prefer the language suggested by the Senator from Idaho to that suggested, although it may be subject to the criticism of ambiguity which the Senator from North Dakota makes. I prefer it because I think that the President should have full power, although it might not fall within the purview of the commerce clause.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not now call to mind any other power under which we could obtain any regulative power other than through the constitutional provision governing interstate commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the case, then the language employed is ample.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I merely want to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. I shall do it in my time, and the Senator can answer in my time if he chooses to do so.

The Senator has referred to the fact that it is necessary to put into the bill the language "buying or selling of wheat in interstate or foreign commerce" in order to make the bill constitutional. It has been suggested on the floor that it is not the actual buying of wheat at all which is at the bottom of all this trouble, but that it is the mere speculation in futures, the buying and selling of wheat on margin, where it is not expected that the wheat will be delivered at all, or, at any rate, not be delivered at the exchange or in the city where the exchange is located. How can you get at this thing if you limit the dealings to transactions in interstate or foreign commerce?

Mr. McCUMBER. Might I ask the Senator a question in his time?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be pleased to answer the Senator's question, if I can.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is it not true that that kind of contract is already prohibited by State law and is made criminal? I refer to the contract of which the Senator speaks, where there is no intention to deliver. But, if I may call the Senator's attention to a fact, he will find that the exchanges in their printed regulations concerning trade strictly prescribe that there must be deliveries in all cases. They also provide for punishment and damages if there is a failure to comply with a contract. So upon the face of it they are dealing in real articles.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that supposedly they are dealing in real articles; but that, like some other assumptions, I am quite convinced is a violent one in many of these transactions. Assuming, however, that every one of them is of that character, where they expect to get the wheat, they expect the wheat to be delivered at the place of purchase, if at all; they do not buy the wheat for delivery somewhere else, but it is to be delivered at the place of purchase. Therefore there is absolutely nothing in the transaction to indicate that the wheat is going into interstate commerce or foreign commerce after its purchase. So I wanted to inquire whether, even though the amendment were amended in the particular suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, it would accomplish the purpose which is sought to be accomplished by the amendment?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not know that I exactly understand the objection which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] made to the substitute offered by the senior Senator from Minnesota, my colleague [Mr. NELSON]. I understood the Senator to say that he thought the substitute tended to make legal a previously illegal transaction. I do not so interpret the amendment. It simply provided that—

> If at any time during the pendency of the existing war between the United States and the German Empire the President of the United States shall find that such dealings in futures, in or about any grain exchange, unduly, unreasonably, and in an unwarranted manner raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals, to the injury of the people of the United States, he may at once request the traders in such exchange to discontinue for a time specified by him all dealings in futures, where there is no actual delivery of the product sold. In case such request of the President is not promptly complied with, then he is hereby empowered to order such dealing in futures, as last aforesaid, to be entirely suspended and discontinued for such limited time as he may direct, and if such order is not promptly complied with he is hereby empowered to close such grain exchange for the purpose of enforcing such order.

There is nothing in that amendment which makes legal a purely gambling transaction in the event that the President does not take any action, or in the event the President should close the grain exchanges for dealing in futures, and then should remove his embargo, or whatever it may be called. This would not make valid a gambling transaction which would come within the inhibition of the laws of the States.

The amendment empowers the President, if in his opinion the dealing in futures—not only gambling transactions, but dealing in futures as it is handled upon these grain exchanges—should unduly enhance prices, to take steps to stop such transactions or dealings and to stop speculation on boards of trade; but when the order expires it does not make any transaction legal which would otherwise be illegal.

I am inclined to believe, after having given this subject a good deal of thought, that the only way to really eliminate injurious speculation upon boards of trade, which unduly enhance the price of grain and other food products, is to place the power in the hands of some official of the Government to compel the exchanges to censor their own trades and to eliminate illegal speculation. The grain exchanges and the other exchanges of this country to a very large extent know their customers, and can, when backed by authority, aid in stopping injurious speculation. It will not do to pass a law prohibiting all dealing in what are called futures. "Futures" mean, in ordinary transactions, the sale or purchase of commodities for future delivery; and to close the exchanges of this country would to a large extent close the markets of the country.

I believe that the amendment offered by my colleague places the power in the hands of the President to stop exactly what we wish to prevent, to wit, gambling, which unduly enhances the price of food products. I can not see how it validates any illegal transaction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I had intended to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota another correction which I think should be made in the draft. The paragraph at the bottom of the first page of the bill defines "futures" as follows:

> All sales of wheat or other food cereals by such traders in such exchanges for future delivery and not for present or immediate delivery shall be known and designated as dealings in futures.

When the President finds that such dealings have unduly enhanced prices, the amendment provides that—

> He may at once request the traders in such exchange to discontinue for a time specified by him all dealings in futures, where there is no actual delivery of the product sold.

Mr. NELSON. In the amendment that I have offered I have stricken out those words.

Mr. WALSH. Very good.

Mr. NELSON. I have omitted the words "where there is no actual delivery of the product sold" in the amendment as I have offered it.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad to be informed by the Senator. There is, however, one other suggestion I should like to make to the Senator. I think the words "unduly, unreasonably, and in an unwarranted manner" should be in the disjunctive. The three conditions should not combine; but when the President "shall find that such dealings * * * unduly or unreasonably raise or enhance the price," and so forth, his power to act shall attach. I suggest to the Senator that he strike out the words "and in an unwarranted manner" and insert the word "or" between the word "unduly" and the word "unreasonably," so that it shall read that whenever he shall find "that such dealings * * * unduly or unreasonably raise or enhance the price," and so forth.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. REED. I suggest to both Senators that if we simply use the word "unreasonably" it will completely cover the case, and that we really weaken the sentence by putting in the other phrase.

Mr. NELSON. I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana, if I correctly understand it. It is to insert, in line 6, after the word "unduly," the word "or," and to strike out the word "and," in line 7, and insert the word "or" there also.

Mr. WALSH. I would strike out, I will suggest to the Senator from Minnesota, the words "and in an unwarranted manner," so as to read that when the President "shall find that such dealings * * * unduly or unreasonably raise or enhance the price."

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that. I will accept that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I renew my suggestion to the Senator. We know, to a large extent, what "unreasonably" means in the law; it has been defined; but there is uncertainty and ambiguity about the word "unduly" and the expression "in an unwarranted manner." One could hardly say a thing unduly raised the price unless it unreasonably raised the price.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire if the Senator from Missouri has made a speech on this amendment?

Mr. REED. I think not—not on this suggested amendment, unless my interrogatory was treated as a speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the suggested amendment? The Chair can not hold that Senators may discuss suggested amendments. They must discuss amendments.

Mr. REED. I hope the Vice President will not be too technical about enforcing that rule——

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not been.

Mr. REED. Or too harsh about it. I suggest to the Senator that the law will be much stronger if he simply employs the word "unreasonably" and leaves out the expression "unduly and in an unwarranted manner," so that the law will apply whenever the President finds that the price of grain has been "unreasonably" raised. I am very much in earnest about it, although I think perhaps the other words do not destroy the effect of that language. I suggest that to the Senator, and will move to strike out the word "unduly" and the expression "and in an unwarranted manner," so that the language will stand "unreasonably raise or enhance the price of wheat," and so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator from Missouri takes his seat, will he answer two questions for me? I want to know if the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota applies to anything except grain?

Mr. REED. Well, it applies to "wheat or other food cereals" by its language.

Mr. McKELLAR. "Wheat or other food cereals" only. Then I want to ask another question. Is there any prohibition against gambling in grain contained in the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota? I can not find any such prohibition, and would be glad if the Senator can point out such a prohibition to me.

Mr. REED. It is not in those express terms. I am not the author of this amendment; but I think it is a very great improvement over others that have been offered.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, while I do not expect that anything which I may say upon this amendment will influence the vote, nevertheless I can not sit silent and see such legislation as this pass the Senate without raising my voice in protest. I want to say for myself that I do not propose to be swept from my feet, nor do I propose to be influenced in my vote here upon measures by popular clamor. This legislation is unwise. It is founded upon a misapprehension of the functions of the grain exchanges, and upon a total misapprehension of the food problem in this country.

If this proposed legislation has any purpose whatever, the purpose is to reduce the price of foodstuffs. There is but one way to reduce the price of food in this country, and that is to produce more food. It seems almost ridiculous that anybody should be compelled to say that; but in a grave national emergency, where the very existence of this Nation depends upon an adequate food supply, we hear constant talk about "food regulation," "food control," and "food dictatorships," and but rarely one single word about the necessity of increasing the production of foodstuffs.

I hold no brief for the grain exchanges of this country; but I do want to speak for the producers of this country, whose interests have been so long neglected in our legislative halls, a neglect which has brought about the very serious condition which some hope will be cured by this single act of legislation.

Mr. President, the average annual value of the crops in the United States is about $9,000,000,000. If our farmers could secure the labor we could produce as much of a crop upon our acreage as the Germans produce—that is, as much per acre—and we would in that case produce in a year approximately $18,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs; but less than one-third of our tillable land is now cultivated, and if we, while producing as much per acre as the Germans, should then double the acreage of land under cultivation, we could produce this year $36,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs.

The condition in this country is totally different from the condition in Europe. There the acreage is absolutely circumscribed. The only thing which they can do under these circumstances is to take up the question of food control; but our acreage is almost unlimited, and the potential supplies of food in the soils of this country are almost beyond computation, and we should talk therefor not so much about food control but rather about how to stimulate food production.

If this legislation is designed to reduce the price of wheat, then it discourages the production of wheat; and the surest way now to destroy this country is to enact legislation which tends to discourage the production of foodstuffs. While such a policy as this may relieve an immediate situation, the dangers that will confront us next spring will be by such measures increased a thousand fold.

Mr. President, of course, in a 10-minute speech I can not go into the merits of the question. There are experts in Washington desiring to be heard upon this subject, experts representing the farmers and experts representing the grain exchanges; but they are not even to be given a hearing. I repeat, I can not in a brief period fully discuss the merits of this legislation; but I desire to say that at such a time as this it is a very dangerous undertaking to begin to interfere with the normal operation of economic laws, and particularly with the fundamental law of supply and demand, that great corrective law, which sooner or later, if allowed freely to operate, will bring about a proper balance of functions in the social body.

The present high price of food is a red flag of warning; and I hope that the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States will not tear down that signal of warning without removing the imminent danger, for to do that means simply to leave this great Nation to plunge on, absolutely unwarned, to peril and perhaps to destruction.

It is a common fallacy to assume that free markets in which grains are bought and sold necessarily result in the enhancement of the prices of foodstuffs. He indeed is a reckless speculator who disregards the fundamental conditions which underlie and control the price. The market price for wheat, for instance, represents the best judgment of the most-informed minds as to the probable condition of the wheat supply. Free trading in wheat is as apt to depress the price as to enhance it, and a free market seems to be the only means by which the price of grain and the supply can be properly adjusted to one another. Political economists have for years paid all too much attention to the subject of distribution and have disregarded too long the fundamental problems of production. Only during recent years have they been inquiring into the profitableness of agricultural operations, and only recent investigations have brought to light the fact that farmers in this country have been for years selling their products below the cost of production under any permanent system of agriculture. The indications now are that if we do not disorder the mechanism which results in a normal movement of prices our agricultural activities will be considerably increased. If we do not disturb the confidence of our farmers that during the next year relatively high prices will prevail, if we take steps to inform our farmers of the necessity for larger crops, if we correct the maladjustments which result in shortages of seed, of fertilizer, of implements, and if we take the necessary steps to insure the farmer a reasonable supply of labor, the problem of our food supply will be very greatly simplified.

The problem before us is not chiefly a problem of the distribution of food and other supplies, but rather the proper distribution of the available labor, a distribution which must be made with due consideration for the relative importance of the various lines of activity which must be carried on in our prosecution of this war.

Personally I believe that our part in this war should be, for the present at least, the efficient adaptation of our man power to the production of those absolutely necessary supplies, and I refer particularly to the food supplies, without which, in a far greater abundance than they are now available, the allies can not continue to hold their lines in Europe. In some way we must put a premium upon the production of those articles which are most necessary.

Sir Alfred Booth, of England, the head of the Cunard Co., in speaking of some of the serious blunders made by England during this war, is reported to have said:

Alarmed by the rising tide, we have tried to stop it by fixing maximum prices, which diminish, or in some cases even stop, production, and at the same time remove the only check on consumption. Rising wages inevitably follow rising prices, and here again the immediate effect is less production and more consumption. So we whirl round and round in a vicious circle, or, rather, in a spiral, which carries us at ever-increasing speed farther and farther away from the point of safety. The fact that the food question is so serious to-day is due as much to our financial follies as to the German submarines.

We must avoid at all costs interfering with or impeding any of the processes which stimulate production. Legislation in the interest of the consumer without regard to the effect upon the producer will certainly cut the arteries of our national life and leave this giant Nation weak and prostrate at the feet of our enemy, an enemy which has shown such wisdom in food legislation as to be now almost invincible in strength for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to support the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If there is any evil that needs to be cured now it is the speculation in foodstuffs, and his amendment, in my opinion, will come as near doing that as anything that can be devised.

I agree with much that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] has said, that the very efforts which have heretofore been made and the agitation which has heretofore been carried on against the price of food has had the very tendency which is objectionable; that is to say, to discourage the production of food. The only way in which this country can restrain an advance in the cost of food is to increase the production of food, and the high prices which now prevail will offer an inducement for a large production of food this year.

Every experiment that has ever been tried in the direction of abolishing produce and grain exchanges has been disastrous. Germany tried it 10 or 15 years ago and was compelled to restore trading in food and farm products on the exchanges, because without those exchanges there was no farm market, no food produce market, and there was no price that the farmers in any part of Germany could depend upon. Even at the time of the Civil War, when Congress, carried away by the evils of the speculation in gold, closed the gold exchange in New York, a panic resulted, and in 17 days Congress was compelled to reopen by law the market for gold in New York. So, I say, the agitation against farm markets, against produce markets, is likely to lead to a miscarriage and produce the very result which we desire to avoid. What we want to do is to put a stop to the speculation in food after the farmer has raised it, and not to discourage the raising of food by attempting to depress the price of food.

It seems to me, therefore, that the substitute which the Senator from Minnesota has offered, which is plainly directed to put a stop, through presidential action, to speculation in food when that speculation results in the undue inflation of the price of food, is the amendment which the Congress should adopt, if any is necessary. I therefore favor the substitute which the Senator from Minnesota has introduced, if anything is needed, and I am not entirely sure that there is. Mr. President, I think we are, in a hysterical frame of mind, crossing a good many bridges before we have come to them; but I am willing to take the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota, because it appears to give some hope of placing a safeguard in the hands of the President, which he can use if the emergency arises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This is a very important matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that there has been no business transacted since the last roll call. There has been discussion, but no business has been transacted. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as on the last roll call and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WATSON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING. I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I understand that he has not voted, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 17—as follows:

So Mr. NELSON's amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I give notice that I reserve the right to offer my amendment again when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I can have for a moment the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge, I desire to offer an amendment and a few words of explanation in order to show its relevancy, and with the explanation of its relevancy I shall be content to submit it.

In the dry-farm homestead act is found a clause which relates alone to the State of Idaho. It provides that those who may avail themselves of this law must reside within 20 miles of the dry-farm homestead. This relates, as I remember, alone to the State of Idaho. It was really inserted in conference, while the bill was on its passage through the Congress. I want to offer an amendment so as to eliminate that clause, which relates alone to my State. I need only say that it prevents the cultivation of many acres of these dry-farm lands. If the Idaho law can be placed upon the same basis as the law with reference to dry farms in other States it will result in increasing the acreage of dry farms in the State of Idaho to a very large extent.

I have before me the report of the Secretary of the Interior favoring the change, which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading, unless some one desires to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 2, 1916.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of your letter of April 22, 1916, transmitting for report H. R. 14900, which proposes to amend the provisions of section 6 of the enlarged-homestead act of June 17, 1910 (36 Stat., 531), applicable to the State of Idaho.

The present law requires that persons who enter lands under said section shall reside within 20 miles of the land entered and "personally" prepare the soil, cultivate it, and harvest the crops. No such requirement is imposed by section 6 of the act of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), applicable to the State of Utah and other States, and this department knows of no reason why any different rule should be applied to enlarged homesteads for lands of the character described in the State of Idaho. The fixing of an arbitrary distance, like 20 miles, and the requirement that the entryman personally prepare the soil and harvest the crops is not necessary in order to accomplish the purpose and intent of the act.

The department agrees that the law should be modified as proposed in H. R. 14900. I have therefore to recommend that the same be enacted.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in what act it is provided that this shall be applicable only to the State of Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will recall, Idaho was brought in under the dry-farm law by a special act. It was not in the original dry-farm law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is, under the 320-acre act?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Under this special act relating to Idaho, this clause was inserted, which is found with reference to no other State. That is, it does not pertain to the general law.

I ask, therefore, to insert before the last section the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Just before the last section in the bill, it is proposed to insert the following:

That section 6 of the act of Congress approved June 17, 1910, "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall find any tracts of land in the State of Idaho, subject to entry under this act, do not have upon them such a sufficient supply of water suitable for domestic purposes as would make continuous residence upon the lands possible he may, in his discretion, designate such tracts of land, not to exceed in the aggregate 1,000,000 acres, and thereafter they shall be subject to entry under this act without the necessity of residence upon the land entered: Provided, That the entryman shall in good faith cultivate not less than one-eighth of the entire area of the entry which is susceptible of cultivation during the first year of the entry, not less than one-fourth during the second year, and not less than one-half during the third year of the entry and until final proof: Provided further, That after six months from the date of entry and until final proof the entryman shall be a resident of the State of Idaho."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the law as it was originally drawn required one-eighth of cultivation during the first two years, one-quarter during the third and fourth years, and one-half during the fifth year, and at the end of the fifth year they could secure title. In a subsequent bill that was passed through Congress those amounts were reduced just one-half. That was the bill authorizing the issuing of patent in three years.

Mr. BORAH. I will ask, then, that those figures be reduced, changing the amount of cultivation each year to one-half what is provided there. Instead of one-eighth, it should be one-sixteenth, and so on.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if this amendment carries an appropriation?

Mr. BORAH. No, sir.

Mr. GORE. I shall interpose no objection, then. I have no authority to accept it, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to line 12, on page 6. The paragraph reads:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seeds, as authorized by section 3 of this act.

The sections have been changed, and it should be section 2.

Mr. GORE. I will say that that correction has been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been made?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out, on lines 7 and 8, page 6, the words "the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock." We have been making very liberal appropriations along that line, and I want to call attention to what we have done in that respect.

Turning to the last Agricultural appropriation act, which provides money for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, we have appropriated under the head of "General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," something over $3,000,000, and there is designated in that appropriation act what the money shall be used for. First—

For the detection, prevention, treatment, or cure of diseases of domestic animals, to test the same, and to disseminate the results of said tests in such manner as he may deem best; to purchase and destroy diseased or exposed animals or quarantine the same whenever in his judgment essential to prevent the spread of pleuropneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another, as follows:

For inspection and quarantine work, including all necessary expenses for the eradication of scabies in sheep and cattle, the inspection of southern cattle, the supervision of the transportation of live stock and the inspection of vessels, the execution of the 28-hour law, the inspection and quarantine of imported animals, including the establishment and maintenance of quarantine stations and repairs, alterations, improvements, or additions to buildings thereon; the inspection work relative to the existence of contagious diseases, and the tuberculin and mallein testing of animals, $628,280.

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $631,560.

* * * * * * *

For all necessary expenses for scientific investigations in diseases of animals, including the maintenance and improvement of the bureau experiment station at Bethesda, Md., * * * $134,600.

* * * * * * *

For investigating the disease of hog cholera and for its control or eradication by such means as may be necessary, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and other methods, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State, or county authorities, $413,100.

* * * * * * *

For all necessary expenses for the investigation, treatment, and eradication of dourine, $99,000.

The total which we have already appropriated for the next fiscal year for those specific purposes is $2,613,336.

Mr. President, we have heard a great deal about the duplication of appropriations, and we have been assured from time to time that earnest efforts would be made to prevent such duplication; and yet, after appropriating $2,613,336 to be expended for eradicating disease of live stock, we have in this bill a provision which precisely duplicates the language used in the annual appropriation act, namely:

For the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock, the enlargement of live-stock production, and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products, $885,000.

It seems to me that we can well afford, if we are going to make an honest effort to prevent the duplication of appropriations—which have become a scandal in our legislation—to strike out those words in this bill:

The prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock.

Leaving the appropriation to stand:

For the enlargement of live-stock production and the conservation and utilization of meat, poultry, dairy, and other animal products, $885,000.

I hope the amendment which I have offered—which I think is a proper one, and which simply prevents an unnecessary duplication of appropriations and the expenditure of money, as I think, unwisely—will be agreed to without serious opposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 13, after the word "labor," it is proposed to insert:

And labor necessary to conserve and preserve perishable products of the farm or garden.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted just prior to the last section of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Just before the last section in the bill it is proposed to insert:

Hereafter no forest reservation shall be created, nor shall any additions be made to one heretofore created, within the limits of the States of New Mexico and Arizona, except by act of Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I will state that I first prepared the amendment so as to apply only to New Mexico, but at the request of the senior Senator from Arizona I have included that State in this amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I suggest to the Senator that, as I understand, we already have a law prohibiting the creation of any forest reserves or additions thereto in any State except by act of Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that that law does not apply either to New Mexico or to Arizona. The law applies to the States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and Wyoming. It was first passed in 1907, and afterwards it was amended so as to include the State of California. At that time New Mexico and Arizona were Territories, and for some reason they were not inserted in the provisions of the bill. I simply introduce this amendment so as to put New Mexico and Arizona on the same footing with these other States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to offer a new section, to be inserted before the last section of the bill, with reference to the date of taking effect of the act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the bill, just prior to the last section of the bill, the following:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to suspend, during the continuance of this act, that provision of the act known as the reclamation act requiring residence upon lands in private ownership or within the neighborhood for securing water for the irrigation of the same, and he is authorized to permit the use of available water thereon upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will just state briefly that those who are familiar with the reclamation act know that under its terms the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell water rights for lands in private ownership only to those who live upon the land or within the neighborhood. Now, the Secretary of the Interior has construed the words "within the neighborhood" to include anybody residing within 50 miles. The situation in some of these projects, I know in my own State, and probably in others, is that there are many private owners of lands who live quite a good way from the lands. They are unable to cultivate. They have been unable for some reason to get a water right, and I know in my State of some who would arrange for the cultivation of these lands if they could get water for them.

The only purpose of this amendment is to allow that to be done. It does not contemplate the acquirement of a permanent water right by the suspension of that provision of the reclamation act; but it does make it possible during this emergency and the continuance of this law for the Secretary to make arrangements so that if there is water available it can be furnished for these lands. I think it would be quite a source of increase of the food supply.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have given a good deal of thought to the question embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, and I think the amendment is quite timely and should be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, section 2 of the bill has been much discussed. That is the section which authorizes the Secretary to buy seeds to sell for cash. I have not yet heard any good reason for that section, and I move that it be stricken from the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that we are very anxious to finish this bill, and he doubtless shares that desire. A motion was made the other day to reduce the amount from $2,500,000 to $1,000,000, I believe, or to strike it out entirely, and it was defeated by a vote of 36 to 18. I thought probably the sense of the Senate expressed in that vote would satisfy the Senator on this proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I make the motion because I said I would.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, referring to the paragraph in regard to the increase of live-stock production, where the appropriation is $885,000, I move to amend that by changing "$885,000" to "$880,000" for the purpose of getting it into conference. I have already made some observations against the language of the appropriation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "$885,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$880,000."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to say that my criticisms of the clause were based largely on the fact that the language was so general. It may be that the Department of Agriculture can show a proper use for very much more money. If it can, I am quite willing to have it appropriated; but I did not think we had sufficient information to justify the large appropriation which was inserted in the bill originally. By this means it can go into conference, and the necessities may be made to appear.

Mr. GORE. I will say that all that will be in conference is the territory between $80,000 and $85,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add prior to the last section in the bill the following:

SEC. —. Any person who has been, or may be, convicted of any offense against the United States may be released on parole for or during any time in which the Government of the United States is engaged in war under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910, and the regulations prescribed thereunder: Provided, That he shall have served at least 90 days of the term for which he was sentenced: And provided further, That during the period of such parole he shall continuously be engaged under the charge of a first friend, or adviser, in civil employment beneficial to the Government while conducting the war, or in the production of foods or manufacture of supplies. The character of such employment shall be determined by the board of parole created by the provisions of said act, with the approval of the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. GORE. I am not authorized, of course, to accept the amendment, but I shall interpose no objection to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say in reference to this amendment that it shortens the period of time provided for by the beneficent parole act and permits prisoners to be paroled provided they are employed in agriculture or in some method of production. The methods of test are just the same as in the parole act. It simply shortens the period of time during which the prisoner must be in jail. It will increase the number of people who are available for work, and it will also, I have no doubt, prove most beneficial to the morale of the prisoners who are now confined.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator that the purpose is to conserve the food products of the country?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is to employ these people in agriculture or some form of production under the constant supervision and control of the parole board.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is civil employment beneficial to the Government or the production or manufacture of supplies? The word "food" is in the amendment, and I presume it is all right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How does it extend the present parole law?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It simply shortens the time during which the prisoners shall be kept in jail.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to renew my amendment, which I send to the desk; and I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There seems to be no necessity for reading the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. No; it is the identical amendment I proposed before. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS's amendment was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. Whenever hereafter during the present war the President shall find that any board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association transacting business in such a way as to be subject to the regulative power of Congress is engaged in, or permitting through facilities afforded by it, speculation in food products of any character in the form of what are known as futures, or in any other form or character, it may be by order of the President suspended until he by proclamation shall declare the existing war to have ended, unless the President shall sooner by order set aside such suspension, and all agreements, wagers, and contracts for wagers regarding such food products now and hereafter made in or upon such exchanges, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, or other bodies or associations, by the members thereof, are hereby prohibited pending such proclamation. Any person, board of trade, chamber of commerce, stock exchange, or other body or association willfully violating the provisions of this section, or any of them, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not to exceed $10,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the actual sale or purchase of commodities for future delivery where actual delivery is contemplated instead of settled for, as is usual in speculative trades.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the roll call begins I desire to say that the Senate has already adopted the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and this amendment now offered by the Senator from Colorado is exactly in the same line as the amendment moved by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the Senator undoubtedly has a right to offer the amendment now that the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He has. I suppose he is offering it as a substitute for the amendment which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is offered as a separate amendment and is clearly in order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an amendment in addition to the one offered by the Senator from Minnesota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is offered without regard to that amendment and is clearly in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The idea being that we shall have two different and conflicting provisions on the same subject matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECKHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. As he is not present and I do not know how he would vote I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). In the absence of the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

So Mr. THOMAS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section prior to the last section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to conduct such operations in the United States, including Alaska, as may be necessary to develop new aquatic sources of food, to secure the utilization of sources now not utilized or inadequately utilized; to improve the methods employed in the catching, preparation, curing, transportation, and marketing of such aquatic foods, and to increase the consumption thereof, and the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to take, catch, prepare, cure, pack, and transport such fishes and other aquatic food animals in the waters of the Pacific Ocean and the waters adjacent thereto, in and adjacent to Alaskan waters, and to market such fishes and other aquatic food animals, and to do all things necessary and convenient for carrying out the purposes of this act.

That for the said purposes the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hire, charter, rent, or purchase buildings and lands, vessels, and fishing gear, and any and all equipment necessary or convenient for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; to employ all persons necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; to purchase either in the open market or in competitive bids such supplies as may be necessary; and to buy and sell fishes and other aquatic food animals, either fresh or cured: Provided, That the proceeds of any sales may be used for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

That for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of this act, including the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office or elsewhere, at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce, there shall be appropriated a sum not to exceed $250,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, this is a very simple amendment. It is the same as the one introduced as in Committee of the Whole except that it confines the authority to fish only in waters of the Pacific or particularly in Alaskan waters, and only authorizes and does not direct the department to go into the business. It leaves it discretionary with the department.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in arguing the matter over again. Some Senators were disposed to make light of the question, but I want to say that it is a matter that ought to receive the attention of the Senate, and if the Senate does not pass it now we will pass it before the war is over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the matter will have the serious consideration of the Senate by and by, but I do not want it to apply to Pacific and Alaskan waters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING].

The amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. KENYON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

I will state that an effort was made to bring up the bill day before yesterday and an objection was interposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] in reference to some contention upon the part of the railway brotherhoods. I will state that we have arrived at an understanding with the Senator from New Hampshire regarding the amendment of the bill, and I think it will require very little time for its consideration. It is one of the important measures being urged by the administration as one of the urgency measures of the war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the close of section 1, to come in on page 2, at the end of line 13:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not let the bill go over until another day. I have not had an opportunity to examine it, and I am really in ignorance about it. I would like to look into it before I vote for or against a measure as important as this seems to be. It is Saturday afternoon; we have had a rather strenuous week; and I hope the Senator will let the bill go over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that it is quite important we should have an executive session this afternoon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to state that two amendments were accepted by the committee, one presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and the other presented by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is agreed to I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada in charge of the bill whether he accepts the proposed amendment by direction of the committee?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We have not had a meeting of the committee to consider it, but the bill was referred in the first instance by the committee to the Senator from Iowa and myself. We amended the original bill and submitted it to the committee, and it was approved without dissent, and if I recollect aright this amendment was presented by the Senator from New Hampshire looking to the interest of the brotherhood, who fear in some way that the language of section 1 will affect the power of strikes. The committee had no such purpose in view. The purpose is simply to protect the railroad itself against physical violence, threats, or intimidations that would prove an interruption in interstate commerce. Therefore the Senator from Iowa and myself have assented to the amendment which is offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the effect that this act shall not in any way affect sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act, with which probably the Senator is familiar.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the amendment is agreed to I would like to have sections 6 and 20 inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall be glad to hear anything the Senator from Iowa has to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the last Congress the Senator from Connecticut was a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. He will remember that this measure was a part of another bill which was considered, and that during the course of its consideration by the committee I offered the amendment which is now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and it was adopted by the committee. To that extent I assume the Senator from Nevada will be justified in saying that it was the sense of the committee that this amendment should become a part of the section.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true. The committee was of the opinion that we should not at this session legislate at all on the subject of strikes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will allow me there, I desire to say that I remember the situation as it was last session when we prepared the bill. We then agreed, if my memory serves me, that the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was an appropriate amendment to the bill then pending. Inasmuch, however, as this bill in its first section limits the operation of that section to the period during the war with Germany only, whereas the previous bill was supposed to be a lasting statute, I simply wanted to see whether it was necessary to adopt this section at this time.

I am not stating that I am opposed to it at all; in fact, I favored it at the last session; but I supposed that this was a war measure, and that the amendment was not now necessary. I am not, however, at all certain about it, and I was simply seeking light on the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] that the amendment be printed and taken up for consideration hereafter, unless there is general acquiescence in the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. If there is to be any contest on the matter, I shall want to address the Senate at length upon it; and I do not think the Senate is in a mood to hear long speeches this afternoon. The suggestion of the Senator from Nevada is entirely agreeable to me. I should like to have the amendment printed, and to be pending when the bill is again taken up.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should be very glad, in addition to that, to have printed in the RECORD, and to have the RECORD disclose, the reference to sections 6 and 20 of what is known as the Clayton Act in connection with the amendment, so that we may see the effect of the entire section.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask that sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be printed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HOLLIS's amendment is, at the end of section 1, to insert:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

The sections of the Clayton Act referred to are as follows:

SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 20. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do; or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I also ask for the printing of the bill itself in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war with Germany, knowingly and willfully, by physical force, threats, or intimidation, obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to employ the armed forces of the United States to prevent any such obstruction or retardation of the passage of the mail, or of the orderly conduct or movement of interstate or foreign commerce in any part of the United States, or of any train, locomotive, car, or other vehicle upon any railroad in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce.

SEC. 2. That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, whenever in his judgment such action is necessary to the public security and defense, to direct that certain kinds of traffic or particular shipments, as may be determined by him, shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carriers by railroad or water, under such arrangements, rules, and regulations as he may prescribe. He may give these directions at and for such times as he may determine, and may modify, change, suspend, or annul them, and for any such purpose he is hereby authorized to issue orders direct, or through such person or persons as he may designate for the purpose. Officials of the United States, when so designated, shall receive no compensation for their services rendered hereunder. Persons not in the employ of the United States so designated shall receive such compensation as the President may fix. Suitable offices may be rented and all necessary expenses, including compensation of persons so designated, shall be paid as directed by the President out of funds which may have been or may be provided to meet expenditures for the national security and defense. All such common carriers are hereby directed and required to establish forthwith, and to maintain continuously in the city of Washington, during the period of the war, an agency by a committee of railroad officers or otherwise fully empowered by such carriers to receive on behalf of all the carriers notice and service of such orders and directions and to arrange for the prompt compliance therewith by such carriers. And it shall be the duty of any and all the officers, agents, or employees of such carriers by railroad or water to obey strictly and conform promptly to such orders, and failure knowingly and willfully to comply therewith, or to do or perform whatever is necessary to the prompt execution of such order, shall render such officers, agents, or employees guilty of a misdemeanor, and any such officer, agent, or employee shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. The President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment it becomes necessary in order to expedite transportation and to do justice between carriers, to enter into agreements with two or more carriers looking to a proper division of earnings for a time to be specified and upon kinds of traffic to be prescribed. For the transportation of persons or property in carrying out the orders and directions of the President the lawfully established tariffs shall apply unless otherwise fixed by law; for the transportation of troops in carrying out the orders and directions of the President, reasonable rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the transportation be for the Government of the United States, it shall be paid for currently or monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That if by reason of giving preference or priority in transportation under an order or direction authorized hereunder, or by reason of disarrangement of traffic caused by giving such preference or priority, any carrier shall suffer injury or damage, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, upon application by the carrier and upon notice to the Attorney General of the United States, and after due hearing, determine the amount thereof, which amount shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds in his hands not otherwise appropriated: Provided further, That no application for any such damage or injury shall be presented to the commission after six months from the expiration of the order of preference or priority. In making such determination the commission shall have due regard for the terms of any acts of land grant or contract existing between any such carrier and the United States, and for the purpose of any such inquiry and determination the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby vested with all the powers which it now has or may be authorized by law to exercise in investigating and ascertaining the justness and reasonableness of rates or charges. Any such findings of the commission shall be subject to review on the merits by a bill in equity, filed either by the Government or by the carrier in a court of competent jurisdiction, with right of appeal as in other equity cases. The final order or decree shall be certified by the court to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall enter the same as its own order. Any carrier complying with any such order or direction herein authorized shall be exempt from any and all provisions in existing law imposing civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities upon carriers on account of any such action.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa now offer the amendment which he proposes to section 2?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Nevada to then ask for the postponement of the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes. I understand that a number of Senators desire to discuss the bill, and that may require some time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in order that the amendment may be before the Senate for information, I move, on page 5, line 20, after the word "direction," to insert the words "for preference or priority"; and on page 5, lines 22 and 23, to strike out the words "on account of any such action" and insert the words "by reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will ask that the amendments which have been proposed be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

LEE S. OVERMAN,
O. W. UNDERWOOD,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
SWAGAR SHERLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the report a complete agreement, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina intend to ask for action upon the conference report this afternoon?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; I have asked for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. Can the Senator tell me what was done with the amendment providing for additional vessels in the Coast and Geodetic Survey?

Mr. OVERMAN. That amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment was cut out?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Washington that the Senate conferees insisted for several days on that amendment, but the argument was made that we were providing for the building of a large number of new ships, and that as soon as the war was over there would be an ample supply of ships for this purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am sorry that the amendment was cut out; but I feel sure that the conferees on the part of the Senate have done the best they could; and I know the attitude of the other House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Washington that I opposed the amendment on the floor, but I insisted as a conferee on the part of the Senate to the extent that I thought we could.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am sure the Senator did so. There is one other amendment which I desire to inquire about. There was an amendment increasing the appropriation for the St. Elizabeth Hospital. Can the Senator tell me what was done as to that amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. That amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator could not get the House conferees to agree to that amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. We could not get an agreement to that amendment. This bill has been in conference a long time, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know it has been. I am sorry the Senator could not get that amendment retained, but I shall not oppose the adoption of the conference report, for I feel that it would not avail anything to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the conference report what action has been taken by the conferees with reference to the appropriation for flood control?

Mr. OVERMAN. We agreed on a compromise after contending for a long time in the conference committee. It was contended that $6,000,000 was about all that could be used this year, and we allowed $6,000,000 instead of $10,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. The conference report, then, represents a reduction in the amendment adopted by the Senate relating to flood control, which provided an appropriation of $10,500,000, to the sum of $6,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Arkansas is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the conference base its action upon the recommendation of the War Department with reference to the matter?

Mr. OVERMAN. The committee of conference contended about this matter for a long time. The Senator from Arkansas knows how that is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know how it is until the Senator from North Carolina tells how it is.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will tell the Senator. The conferees on the part of the Senate contended for the whole amount, but the House conferees would not agree to a greater sum than $6,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. The War Department stated in its report to the Senate and to the other House that the sum of $10,500,000 was necessary to carry out the provisions of the act commonly known as the flood-control bill. The Senator from North Carolina now states that $6,000,000 is carried in this conference report. I ask the Senator whether that meets the approval of the War Department?

Mr. OVERMAN. We did not confer with the War Department as to their approval or disapproval. We thought that was a sufficient amount for this year's expenditure. Another appropriation bill will come in, as the Senator knows, in five or six months. We did not confer with the War Department about the matter, as I have said.

Mr. ROBINSON. The act providing for flood control contemplated an appropriation of $10,500,000 for the coming fiscal year. That is the amount that is required to effectuate the recommendations already made by the War Department. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he conferred in any respect with the War Department as to the reduction that has been made in this conference report?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have just stated that we did not.

Mr. ROBINSON. You did not. Then, Mr. President, the Senate conferees have agreed to an appropriation $4,000,000 less than the amount which was contemplated by the flood-control act. The purpose of Congress in passing the act to provide for flood control was to place these appropriations upon a permanent and a continuing basis. The War Department has estimated that $10,500,000 is necessary to carry out the plans which have already been agreed upon. It now appears that, without consulting the War Department, the Senate conferees have agreed upon the sum of $6,000,000, which is a little more than half the amount that is necessary, according to the estimates which have already been made.

Nothing has been accomplished by the passing of the flood-control bill if the plans that have already been adopted by the War Department are not to be carried out. That is the purpose of the legislation.

I do not know that I care to insist upon a delay in the consideration or upon the defeat of this conference report; but it is an illustration, Mr. President, of the manner in which Congress deals with these subjects. We took up this question, we debated it fully, and Congress passed a law providing for improvements which would require an appropriation of $10,500,000 for the next fiscal year. Now, after the Senate has agreed to an appropriation to carry out the improvements which have already been approved by the War Department, requiring an appropriation of $10,500,000, we are confronted with a proposition to either resist the appropriation of a little more than half that amount or substantially to have no appropriation at all.

Mr. President, we are spending hundreds of millions and billions of dollars for the maintenance of the activities of our Government during the next year, and we are here cutting in two an appropriation of vital importance which represents an internal improvement which has been approved and recommended by the War Department in the sum of $10,500,000. I do not know that it would accomplish anything to make any further remarks concerning the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to answer the argument that has just been made? I will occupy only a few moments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think my friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has a misconception of the facts under which the conferees were working. I think, instead of actually cutting down the estimate, we have given more than the department called for. The flood-control bill which was passed did not provide that the Congress of the United States should appropriate $10,500,000, but it provided that the appropriations for that purpose should not exceed $10,500,000, which was really an authorization for that amount, but did not call for that amount.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Alabama if he states that the War Department does not recommend the appropriation of $10,500,000 to carry out the improvements that have already been agreed upon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I say they did not recommend it immediately. They say, however, they will need it ultimately.

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if the Senator will allow me, I will state the case.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, I will allow the Senator, when he is speaking in his own time; but the Senator from Alabama knows that the War Department has made an estimate that it will require $10,500,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To finish the whole work.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; not to finish the whole work. It will require $45,000,000 to finish the whole work. I ask the Senator from Alabama if the conference committee acted upon the theory that $10,500,000 would complete the whole work? If they did, then I shall have something further to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; but here is the proposition: I do not know who is responsible for bringing the estimates here; but the only estimate for this appropriation for this year that was sent to us by the War Department, and that bears on the subject, was dated March 3, 1917, which was in the closing days of the last Congress. They estimated $4,000,000 for the Mississippi River and $500,000 for the Sacramento River.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, now, if the Senator will show me, I should like——

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; but I should like to finish my statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator declines to yield, all right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not decline to yield, but I am just in the midst of my statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. When the Senator is ready to yield he may do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the Senator, if the Senator will allow me to make the statement.

What I have stated was the official estimate that came down here. On March 2 there was a letter sent here by Gen. Black, which reads as follows:

> The work proposed on the Mississippi River is in continuation of work of the same character as that which has been carried on for a number of years, so that it is well organized and can proceed at the maximum rate permitted. The pending river and harbor bill carries an item of $6,000,000 for this work, and the additional estimate submitted herewith calls for $4,000,000 for the Mississippi River.

Some doubt has been expressed concerning the passage of the river and harbor bill. If this does not pass, then the estimate for the Mississippi River should be increased from $4,000,000 to $10,000,000.

That is the only statement the committee had in reference to the matter. The river and harbor bill did fail, and of course the appropriation carried in the river and harbor bill went down with it. It is true there is another river and harbor bill pending, but I doubt whether this appropriation would properly come under that bill any longer. Probably it should be carried as an item in the sundry civil bill.

This matter was called to the attention of the House conferees. They insisted that that estimate was for $4,500,000, and that was as far as they were willing to go. The conferees on the part of the Senate insisted that the appropriation should be $10,500,000. We could not agree and finally settled the question by agreeing upon an appropriation of $6,000,000, which, under the present circumstances, I think is probably all that the War Department will actually use this year. That is the real situation as the case presented itself to the conferees. Now I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will wait until the Senator concludes his statement, if he has anything further to say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I take the floor in my own right, Mr. President.

The statement of the Senator from Alabama discloses the fact that when the estimate which he has read was made by the War Department there was pending in the House of Representatives the river and harbor appropriation bill, carrying an appropriation for flood control. It failed of passage. The Senator from Alabama in his statement has conceded that the failure of the passage of the river and harbor bill during the last session of Congress makes it necessary to appropriate the sum of $10,500,000 for flood control, in order to carry out the estimates that were made by the War Department. I ask the Senator from Alabama if that statement is not true?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just made it; it is bound to be true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, the conferees on the part of the Senate in agreeing to this appropriation of $6,000,000 have cut substantially in two the appropriation which the War Department has estimated as necessary for flood control.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I presume the Senator realizes that it is impossible to get engineers this year to do this work. All available Army engineers are being sent to the Army to drill men, and the civil engineers of the country are also all employed. We can not spend $10,000,000 on the work this year. I hope that the department will be able to expend $6,000,000; but I doubt whether they can even expend that much; and, Mr. President, I want to say we had to take that or allow the bill to fail.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Carolina is mistaken. When this bill was pending in the Senate I based the amendment which I offered upon reports and recommendations made upon surveys heretofore completed by the engineers of the War Department. The Senator from North Carolina is mistaken when he says that the engineers are now being withdrawn from work of this character to engage in military activities, and therefore it is not necessary to appropriate this full sum. The estimates have already been made; the surveys have been made; and the sum of $10,500,000 is the sum that the War Department, before the beginning of the war, recommended as necessary to carry out the improvements required to promote flood control. The fact of the matter is that the Senate conferees have surrendered to the House conferees.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what we did.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is it exactly. The Senator from North Carolina says "that is what we did." Notwithstanding the fact that the law was already in existence when this bill passed the Congress contemplating an appropriation of $10,500,000, that body at the other end of the Capitol failed to appropriate one dollar for flood control.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator rather have $6,000,000 or nothing?

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, I will come to that in a moment. That is a proposition that is frequently made here. Not a dollar was appropriated in the bill as it came to the Senate for flood control, notwithstanding the fact that a statute had been enacted providing for a continuing appropriation of substantially $10,500,000 a year for the purposes of flood control. We put the amendment on in the Senate. The Senate conferees have agreed to a reduction of the amount required under the estimates that have already been made contemplating an appropriation of $10,500,000, to $6,000,000, and now they ask me whether I would rather have $6,000,000 or nothing. I submit to the Senator from North Carolina that his inquiry implies bad faith on his part as a conferee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. How, Mr. President?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate voted an appropriation of $10,500,000, and now he has hurled into my face the inquiry whether I would rather have $6,000,000 or nothing.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I asked. I tell the Senator that we held out and tried to get the full amount appropriated by the Senate, but could not do so, and would the Senator not rather have that than nothing?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator understands the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why, of course; but the question which the Senator from North Carolina asks me neither reflects credit upon my intelligence nor his appreciation of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is raising a row here about nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I am not raising a row about nothing. Whenever an appropriation comes near to the interests of the State of the Senator from North Carolina he is vigilant in looking after it, but it so happens that the conferees on this bill do not come from the district that is affected by the improvement of the Mississippi River.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is getting pretty close to the line.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I am approaching the line, and receding from it when I approach it. I know where the line is, Mr. President. I see the line. If the conferees on the part of the Senate had stood for the improvement that was contemplated and required by the solemn act of Congress providing for flood control, we would have had $10,500,000 instead of $6,000,000; but they laid down on it; they surrendered, in the language of the Senator from North Carolina, to the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, Congress fully thrashed this subject out just a few months ago. We agreed that $10,500,000 was necessary to carry on the improvements. I understand that when an appropriation does not go to a district or a State that is represented in the conference the issue may not be effectually represented there. Mr. President, I submit that during the last 10 years agitation has been going on throughout the United States concerning the subject of flood control; that one of the primary purposes of passing the flood-control bill was to put these improvements upon a permanent and a continuing basis; but now, after the Senate has passed upon the matter and agreed to carry out the provisions of the flood-control bill, the Senate conferees have come back here with a half loaf and ask me whether I would rather have that than nothing. Why, of course, Mr. President, I take the half loaf rather than nothing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 2, 1917.

The House met at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O that men would love the Lord, our God and our Father, for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men; that they may praise and worship Thee from the heart; that Thy will may be done and their work be worthy of Thy praise; that Thy kingdom may come in an everlasting peace through Him who taught us to do unto others as we would be done by; to the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ERECTION OF TEMPORARY BUILDINGS ON SMITHSONIAN GROUNDS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. To ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 94, authorizing the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to permit the Secretary of War to erect temporary buildings in the Smithsonian grounds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 94, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to grant permission, under such conditions and restrictions as they may deem necessary, to the Secretary of War to erect for the use of the War Department a temporary structure or structures in the Smithsonian grounds in the city of Washington: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have such building or buildings removed from the said grounds and the site or sites thereof placed in as good condition as at present within three years from the date of the approval of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Florida make a statement in regard to the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the War Department has been extremely anxious for some time to construct some buildings for the use of the Aviation Service. The Secretary of War advises the committee that the plans have been drawn, arrangements have already been made, and that these buildings must be constructed somewhere. There is really no other place to put them, and, for the benefit of the House, I will read the letter from the Secretary of War under date of May 29:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 29, 1917.

Hon. FRANK CLARK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK: In response to your recent request in regard to the necessity for the passage of H. J. Res. 94 at the present session of Congress, to authorize the erection of temporary buildings in the Smithsonian Grounds for the use of the War Department, I beg to advise you that the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stats., pt. 1, p. 444), provides that no building or structure shall be erected upon public grounds in the District of Columbia except by express authorization of Congress.

The Chief Signal Officer of the Army, in conjunction with the officials of the Smithsonian, has arranged with the Board of Regents of the latter institution to erect a temporary building for the Aviation Service. This building is urgently needed, the plans have been completed and approved, the contract for its erection has been arranged, and the material is ready for use as soon as the proper authorization by Congress shall be given. The War Department is not able to secure any other building adequate for this purpose, and must build somewhere. It will greatly promote the efficiency of the service to have this additional space in the same locality with the Smithsonian Institution, which will cooperate in the study of the problems involved.

May I ask you to bring the resolution to the early attention of the House, in order that the erection of this building may be proceeded with as promptly as possible?

Sincerely, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that explains the resolution as fully as it can be explained. There is no doubt as to the urgency of the matter. It ought to have been built some time ago, but they are all in readiness now, contracts have been arranged, materials have been purchased, plans have been provided, and the money is in readiness to erect these buildings, and I trust that there will be no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MANN. My understanding is, from statements which have been made, that it is the desire to construct a temporary building south of the main Smithsonian buildings, south of the taxidermist building, right on B Street, and that it is not contemplated putting any building between the Smithsonian Building and the New National Museum.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; not at all.

Mr. MANN. One of the purposes of this is to permit the Aviation Service of the War Department to have the benefit of close contact with the Smithsonian, which has given considerable study to aviation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So the Secretary of War states in his letter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will recall that it was the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution who brought out the plans for flying machines, and that the Smithsonian Institution has always been interested in the problem of aviation.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; and it strikes me that it is very proper that the building should be put in close proximity to that institution for the reason which the gentleman states.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ACCEPTANCE OF STATUE OF SEQUOYAH.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the consideration of House concurrent resolution 11, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the statue of Sequoyah, presented by the State of Oklahoma, to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his distinguished civic services.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of Oklahoma.

The report (by Mr. SLAYDEN) is as follows:

The Committee on the Library, having had under consideration the resolution (H. Con. Res. 11) accepting the statue of Sequoyah from the State of Oklahoma, report it back with the recommendation that it do pass.

SEQUOYAH.

Sequoyah, whose statue it is proposed to accept from the State of Oklahoma, was born in the State of Georgia about 1770. He was the son of a full-blooded Cherokee woman and a German trader by the name of George Gist, who dealt in contraband articles, and who abandoned his wife before Sequoyah was born.

Sequoyah grew up to young manhood among the Cherokees in Georgia and became a leader in the affairs of his tribe. He not only took an active part in hunting and fishing, as well as sports, but became a trader, silversmith, blacksmith, and philosopher, and later the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet, upon which his chief claim to fame rests. This invention is most remarkable when it is known that he never attended school and could neither read nor write the English language.

Following the invention of the Cherokee alphabet, consisting of 85 characters, in 1821, it was accepted by the tribe and he was voted a silver medal in 1824 as a mark of distinction. In 1828 an iron printing press was purchased by the Cherokees with Cherokee and English type, from which the Cherokee Phœnix was published at New Echota, Ga. It was the first newspaper printed in the Indian language. The paper was discontinued about 1835 and another, the Cherokee Advocate, was established in the Indian Territory west, now a part of Oklahoma, in 1845. It ceased publication during the Civil War and was reestablished in 1870 and published until 1905, both in English and Cherokee.

The effect of this alphabet upon the future advancement of the Cherokee Indians and all other Indian tribes is difficult to fully appreciate. Immediately after its invention not only were newspapers published in the Indian language which could be read by all, but the New Testament, hymns, tracts, and books of various kinds were published, resulting, no doubt, in the adoption of the first written Indian constitution in 1827, modeled after that of the United States and the several States, and the formation of a government with three distinct branches—legislative, executive, and judicial—similar to the government of the surrounding States.

Sequoyah came to Washington as one of the representatives of the western tribes of Indians in 1828, when his invention was recognized by Congress and an appropriation of $500 was made for his benefit. Additional appropriations were made by Congress for the education of the children of the tribe.

In 1823 he moved from Georgia with other members of the Cherokee Tribe west, first into the Territory of Arkansas and later to the Indian Territory, now a part of Oklahoma.

While in Washington he conceived the idea of inventing another alphabet by means of which all Indians upon the American Continent speaking different languages could communicate with each other. In the early forties he started out on a western tour to visit the western Indian tribes and further this plan, but he never lived to accomplish the end sought. He died in the far West about 1845, near San Bernardino, the exact spot being unknown.

Sequoyah's English name was George Guess, a corruption of Gist, and the word Sequoyah means "guessed it." The Cherokee Tribe in the Indian Territory west further recognized his great services by voting him a pension and naming one of its counties for him, and this honor was continued by the State of Oklahoma. Under the act of Congress authorizing each State to place two statues representing distinguished men in Statuary Hall, the first to be presented on behalf of the State of Oklahoma is that of Sequoyah, the Cherokee Cadmus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, there are always exercises connected with the ceremonies accepting these statues. When are the exercises to take place?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will say that the exercises will take place in Statuary Hall at 10.30 o'clock Wednesday morning, June 6.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed was laid on the table.

RECEPTION OF ITALIAN MISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as the committee to escort the Italian mission to the floor of the House Mr. FLOOD, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. PORTER, and Mr. LAGUARDIA, and, in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House will stand in recess for 30 minutes.

Accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m.) the House stood in recess.

At 11 o'clock and 55 minutes a. m. the commissioners of the Italian Government to the Government of the United States, his Royal Highness Ferdinando di' Savoia, Prince of Udine; Tenente de Zara, aid to the prince; His Excellency the Hon. Enrico Arlotta, minister of transportation; His Excellency Marquis Luigi Borsarelli di Rifreddo, undersecretary of state for foreign affairs; Hon. Guglielmo Marconi, senator of the Kingdom; Hon. Francesco Saverio Nitti, member of the Chamber of Deputies; Hon. Augusto Ciuffelli, member of the Chamber of Deputies; Cavaliere de Parente, secretary of legation and secretary of the mission; Duke of Sangro, aid to Senator Marconi; Cavaliere Pietra, of the commercial mission; Gen. Guglielnotti, military attaché; and Commander Vannutelli, naval attaché, accompanied by Count V. Macchi di Cellere, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, accredited to the United States; Mr. Breckenridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State; and Lieut. Col. J. C. Gilmore, United States Army.

The distinguished visitors were escorted to the Speaker's rostrum amid prolonged applause and cheers, and the Prince of Udine was seated on the right of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I present to you his royal highness, the Prince of Udine. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRINCE OF UDINE.

The PRINCE OF UDINE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, no one could appreciate the honor of your invitation more than myself and my colleagues.

To address the Representatives of the greatest among new democracies at a time when the destinies of humanity are awaiting decision, at a time when our destiny and yours depend on the issue of the war, to bring you the greeting of distant brothers who are fighting for the same ideals at the foot of the snowy Alps or in the deadly trenches, to express to you our feelings and our sympathy for your feelings—all those are for me so many reasons for legitimate pride. [Applause.]

During our brief stay among you we have found everywhere the most joyous welcome and the most friendly cordiality. Everywhere it was not only friendly words that greeted us but also friendly souls who welcomed us.

We have felt deeply moved by this.

We know, gentlemen, that such cordial sentiments, such hearty friendship, are meant not so much for our persons as for our beautiful and distant country; our country, of which every foot is sacred to us because of its century-old greatness and sufferings and because of the noble share which it has always had in human thought and history. [Applause.]

But your great Republic, when it grants us such courteous hospitality, honors still more that which at the present moment is dearest to us—the efforts of Italy's soldiers, the noble sacrifice of so many young lives freely given for their country and for civilization and in defense of ideals which you have made your own and which we all love.

In the name of the soldiers of Italy, one of whom I am proud to be; in the name of all those who are fighting on the mountains, on the plains, and on the treacherous seas; in the name of those to whom your words of friendship have brought a message of hope and faith across the ocean, I thank you from the bottom of my heart. [Applause.]

The aims of the war for the allied nations were pointed out by President Wilson in his magnificent message, which will not only remain in the minds of our descendants as a historic event, but which has already aroused, because of its moral force, intense admiration among all civilized peoples. We shall be satisfied, whatever sacrifices we may be called upon to make, when the rights of humanity are assured, when the guaranties of peace are effectual, and when free nations are able to work for their own prosperity and elevation.

President Wilson has proclaimed that to the Americans right is more precious than peace and that the people of the United States are ready to shed their blood in defense of those principles in the name of which they became a nation.

For the sake of the same principles we are ready to face every sacrifice and every sorrow.

We are fighting a terrible war. Our enemies were long since prepared for it, while we were content to live, trusting in peace, and only sought to contribute to the development of our people and to the progress of our country, almost unconscious of the clouds which so suddenly grew dark over our heads.

We came into the war when we realized that there was no room for neutrals and that neutrality was neither possible nor desirable, when the freedom of all democratic nations was threatened and the very existence of free peoples was at stake.

Ever since that day we have not hesitated before any danger or any suffering. Our wide fighting front presents conditions of exceptional difficulty. The enemy is, or has been until now, in possession of the best positions. He has dug deep trenches; he has concealed his guns among the mountains. We are even compelled to fight at altitudes of eight and ten thousand feet, in spots where it seemed impossible that any fighting should ever take place. We are alone on our wide and treacherous front, and every step forward that we take, every progress that we accomplish, costs us great efforts and many lives. The enthusiasm of our soldiers has often helped them among the glaciers of the Alps and the many snares of the Carso to triumph over difficulties which seemed to defy every human effort. But the deep faith which burns in them kept their strength alive. [Applause.]

We must, we will, triumph over other difficulties and other insidious devices.

Nature, which gave us our pure skies, our mild climate, has denied us almost entirely the two great necessities of modern industry—coal and iron. Therefore, with industries still in course of formation, Italy has had ever since their inception to overcome obstacles which appeared insuperable. Italy occupies one of the first places in Europe as regards the number and power of her waterfalls; but this wealth, which constitutes the great reserve of the future, has only been partly exploited until now. The treacherous enemy, who has long since prepared the weapons of aggression, not having obtained victory on the field, is now trying by means of submarine warfare to endanger our existence, to cause a scarcity of food, and, above all, a scarcity of the coal which Italy needs for her ammunition factories, for her railways, and for her industries.

We have reduced our consumption of all necessities, and we are ready to reduce it still further within the limits of possibility. We do not complain of the privations that we have to endure. Wealth itself has no value if life and liberty are endangered. And when millions of soldiers offer their young lives for their country there is not one among the civil population who is not ready to make any sacrifice.

But to overcome the dangers of the submarines, which, in defiance of every law of humanity, are not only destroying wealth but endangering the lives of peaceful travelers, sinking hospital ships, and murdering women and children, we must all make a great effort.

We must unite all our forces to oppose the strongest resistance to the insidious devices of the enemy. You possess a great and magnificent industrial organization. You, more than anyone, are in a position to put an end to the enemy's barbarous dream and to create with your energy much more than he can destroy. [Applause.]

This great and terrible trial can only make us better men. They who know how to offer to the fatherland their wealth and their lives; they who give themselves unto death and, more than themselves, that which is sweetest and most sacred, their children; they who are ready to suffer and to die; they will know when the morrow dawns how to contribute to civilization new elements of moral nobility and of strength. [Applause.]

We must not grieve over our sorrows. When we fight for the rights of humanity we are conscious that we are elevating ourselves morally.

When America proclaimed herself one with us a great joy ran through every city and every little village of Italy. We knew the full value of your cooperation, and at the same time we appreciated the nobility of your sentiments.

The families of 3,000,000 Italians who dwell in the United States under the protection of your hospitable and just laws felt a deep sense of joy.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the words which His Majesty the King of Italy, first among our soldiers, wrote to your President expressed his feelings and those of all his people.

To-morrow when the news reaches Italy that this Congress, which represents the will of the American Nation, has desired to give to our mission the supreme honor of welcoming it in its midst your friendly words will reach the farthermost points where men are fighting and suffering. And in the trenches, at the foot of the majestic Alps, there where the struggle is bitterest and where death is ever present, a thrill of joy and of hope will be felt—the joy of a sincere union, the hope of certain victory. [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

The SPEAKER. I am certain that every Member of the House of Representatives will be delighted to see and hear the man who invented wireless telegraphy, Signor Marconi. [Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS OF SIGNOR MARCONI.

SIGNOR MARCONI. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I appreciate very highly the honor and the privilege of being allowed to say a word to you in this assembly. Up to two minutes ago I did not know that I would have the honor of being called upon to say a few words here, and I sincerely thank the Speaker for the privilege. I have had the pleasure of listening to the words spoken by the chief of our mission, his royal highness the Prince of Udine, and there is very little that I could add to his expressions or to his feelings, which are the feelings of the whole of Italy, which are feelings of friendship for this country and of appreciation for the great step which it has taken in joining us and our allies in Europe in this great war. [Applause.] There is one thing that I can add, however. It is that it was my privilege to live for many years in America [applause] and I think I know America and Americans fairly well. I flatter myself that I know them very well. No one more than myself rejoices in the fact that we in Italy have America with us. I have worked in America and America has always been, in a large way, in my plans, for without America my work could not have succeeded.

I have learned to appreciate in America two things that I can express in two words—justice and fair play. [Applause.] You are ready to back anything that you think may be of good to the world, and you are ready to encourage any honest endeavor to advance science or the applications of science; and although you are the greatest industrial Nation in the world, although there is healthy competition—and it is only by that healthy competition there can be such progress—what you do here is always fair. I can say that with absolute conviction from the bottom of my heart.

Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, I thank you very much for the way in which you have received this mission, for the way in which you have received the utterances of His Royal Highness, the president of our mission, and for the way in which you have received the very few remarks I have been able to improvise. [Prolonged applause and cheers.]

The members of the Italian mission then took their places at the right of the Speaker's rostrum, and the Members of the House of Representatives were presented to them.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2133), the war-risk insurance bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2133), with Mr. BYRNES of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2133), the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2133) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Amend by striking out all of section 3.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it may be that the committee has some good reason for introducing section 3, which is a new piece of legislation, but it ought not to be passed, in my judgment, without some further discussion or explanation. A careful reading of section 3 shows that it proposes to put the United States Government, through its Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, in the business of guaranteeing foreign ships and foreign cargoes. Now, I question whether we want to go that far, if the business is to become permanent. It provides a reinsurance plan in cooperation with foreign nations with whom we happen to be on friendly terms during the war, but there is no limitation upon the responsibility that we are to assume, and we may enter into reinsurance agreements to protect vessels of foreign friendly flags or their cargoes. Whether that means we shall go so far as to protect their crews and provide remuneration for loss of their clothing is not clear, although that is provided for in a previous section of the bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It says:

That the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make provision for reinsurance by the United States of vessels of foreign friendly flags or their cargoes.

That does not include insurance of the officers or crews or their clothing——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I take the statement of the gentleman for that, but the preceding paragraph does provide for loss of life or limb or personal effects.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This does not include anything but the vessels and cargoes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That removes that question. However, the question of our entering into this foreign business with the money of the United States still stands. We may insure in cooperation with other nations vessels of foreign friendly flags or we may reinsure with the Governments of other countries vessels of the United States. It is a cooperative scheme, a reinsurance plan which means that this Government may be putting us in a permanent business of competing with private or independent insurance companies for this foreign trade, and the complications resulting from it may bring confusion ultimately to the Government of the United States. This paragraph ought to be more thoroughly explained than it has been, or there should at least be a time limitation placed upon it for such reinsurance agreements as are provided. I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the origin of this bill, like other bills which have been brought in here in the last two months, is in the fact that we are in a state of war. In order to win that war we must have supplies for our own men and our allies. We have to insure the crews of ships engaged in our merchant marine in order to induce those crews to go abroad with our commerce. This proposition is to help insure the ships of our allies who are on the first battle line, and between us at present and the enemy, and they may whip the enemy before the enemy reaches us with the greatest severity of the war. We propose in line with other insurance practices to reinsure the ships or the cargoes, or both, of our allies. In fact, they are waging war against the same enemy and they have insured the ships and the cargoes partly and the proposition is reciprocal, as I understand it. We propose to insure their ships which are engaged in carrying supplies from us to them just as well as our own ships which are engaged in doing so.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. We expect them to reinsure our ships, if necessary, on the same basis. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. NORTON. That is just the question I was going to ask, whether the English Government or the French Government or the Italian Government and other governments in war against the central European powers have legislated to provide reinsurance for American ships and cargoes?

Mr. ADAMSON. The understanding is that there will be a reciprocal arrangement, that the English and French Governments will reinsure American ships engaged in the same line of business just as we reinsure their ships engaged in commerce between us and them. Those ships are engaged in supplying the sinews of war. Whether they be English or French ships or American ships they are all engaged in the same business of carrying supplies from us to them. It is only permissive; it is not compulsory. The authorities of the Government are authorized to make this arrangement which we ask.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for just a moment. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think this character of legislation is right along the line that we have been pursuing for some time and making the great mistakes of this war. It seems to me that in legislating in this way we are taking in too much territory; we are taking altogether too much upon ourselves. It reminds me of a story I heard when I was a young boy out in North Dakota. There was a French Canadian in the town of Pembina who imbibed somewhat freely one evening, and as a result became noisy and pugnaciously inclined. Looking around the crowd in the barroom, he announced in quiet tones, "I can whip anybody in Pembina." Nobody paid any attention to him, and then after taking another glass, he declared in louder tones, "I can whip anybody in Cavalier County." Nobody paid any attention to this declaration. Then he took another glass, and said in a loud voice, "I can whip anybody in North Dakota." Nobody paid any attention even to this statement. Then finally he took another glass, and throwing out his chest he shouted at the crowd in the room, "I can whip anybody in the United States."

At this a little New York salesman who had been quietly listening to the French Canadian's boasting, walked up to him and planted a blow square on his chin which knocked him out completely for two or three minutes. When he came to he staggered to his feet, rubbed his head, looked sheepishly at the laughing crowd, and said, "Last time a'tank a'took in too much ter-tori."

That is exactly what we are doing by this character of legislation—taking on too much responsibility. We are unnecessarily taking in too much territory in this war. It will not be very long until our allies, so called, will be saying that they will condescend to help us to carry on this war. Unless we are more mindful of our own purposes and interests in this war the chief burden of all the war against the central European powers will be shifted upon the people of this Nation. I do not find from anything that the chairman of this committee has said that England in the last two or three years has passed any legislation providing for the reinsurance of American ships or that France has done so. The gentleman says there is going to be a reciprocal agreement. That is the position in which we find ourselves.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to remind him that it was only lately that we were in this war, and it was not necessary for us to indulge in war legislation until the war came on.

Mr. NORTON. I will say, in reply to the reminder of the gentleman, that England, France, Russia, and Japan have been in this war now for nearly three years, and they have not seen fit since this Nation has declared war against Germany to pass any legislation to assist the United States through reinsuring our ships and shipping. The reciprocal part of this affair seems to me to consist of this Nation giving and the other nations taking what we give.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was not necessary for them to pass any legislation in regard to us until the alliance came into existence.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman from North Dakota realize that the acute situation now is the danger from the U boats?

Mr. NORTON. That is nothing new. I realize all of that. Everybody that knows anything about the war situation realizes that.

Mr. BORLAND. Does he not realize it will encourage the sending of merchant ships to sea if ample provision is made for insurance?

Mr. NORTON. Yes; and I realize that England would be perfectly willing that this Nation should take the entire burden of this tremendous war off her hands. That is what we are drifting to in legislation of this kind. It is about time that we stopped and considered the interest of our own people in this war and our proper position in the war and proceeded on a program to fight our own part in this war, without taking upon ourselves all the burdens of our so-called allies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. NORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] stated that a reciprocal arrangement was contemplated. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that nowhere in the testimony and nowhere in the report is there any reference to a reciprocal arrangement. The report indicates that only two men ask for this legislation, Mr. W. M. Davey and Mr. Herndon Chubb, of the advisory board. We have no information from the Secretary of the Treasury on this question of reciprocal arrangement at all. All the Secretary of the Treasury has indicated was that we ought to provide insurance for the men, whether native or alien, needed to man the merchant marine. There is nothing in the report here coming from any official source whatever, except from those two members of the advisory board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, it is very necessary that some money should be appropriated for this purpose. I note that there are some gentlemen here who are not willing for the Government even in war times, to go into any kind of business when it touches institutions near their home, and they can not defend the interests in their particular territory without referring in a sneering way to the part that we are taking in this war.

Gentlemen, men are dying in Europe for liberty and human rights, without which no decent government can last, and this Government has been drawn into the war, and it has joined hands with the allies. It has gone in heart and soul with them, and we are sincerely doing everything that we can to bring victory to our cause. When I hear gentlemen on the other side, or on this side, it makes no difference with me which, making such allusions as we have heard from one gentleman here this morning, I am going to enter my protest. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. NORTON] referred to our allies in this war as our "so-called" allies? Gentlemen, that is wrong! I do not care on which side you sit or to what political party you belong, you are not speaking the American spirit of loyalty to our flag since we have joined forces with the allies in a common cause when you refer to them as our "so-called" allies. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course everyone recognizes the fact that an insurance company has to spread its risks and that no insurance business would be safe where the risk is not spread out over a considerable number. It is true even with a little farmers' cooperative insurance society. But when you spread the risk over a certain amount you gain nothing by increasing the amount of this spread, as a rule. The theory of this bill is that the United States insurance branch will be conducted more safely and at less risk if it is permitted to partake in the insurance of all the foreign shipping owned by the countries or the citizens of the countries at war with Germany.

I am not deluded myself by this theory. The Government of the United States carries no insurance itself on its buildings. Why not? Because it has so many buildings and has a sufficient spread to self-insure them. A great railroad company carries no insurance. Why not? Because its spread of ownership is so great that it itself meets the law of probabilities and is able to carry its own insurance at a less rate than it could insure, probably. Now, we have a sufficient amount of insurance, probably, on American ships to carry a sufficient spread to protect this Government. I do not know, no one can predict, just what will take place in the future; but, of course, that has been the case up to date. This bill, while it professes to safeguard the interests of the Government and makes our risk less by letting the foreign governments reinsure our risks, still increases the liability of the Government in the way of an appropriation from $15,000,000 to $50,000,000. If, in fact, it was to lessen the liability of the Government, lessen the risk of the Government, there is no occasion for increasing the appropriation.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman does not take into consideration that this bill will insure the lives of the crews.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes. I know it very well. But the insurance on the lives of the crews does not make up the difference between $15,000,000 and $50,000,000, and neither the gentleman nor anyone else will claim it for a moment.

Mr. SNOOK. Does the gentleman take into account the fact that one month after the war was declared the number of risks sprang from 300 to almost 1,100?

Mr. MANN. Well, that shows that we do not need this reinsurance business.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman is talking about the amount of the appropriation we are carrying.

Mr. MANN. Oh, we did increase the amount heretofore from $5,000,000, where it was originally, to $15,000,000, and now the claim of the committee—I will not say that, but the claim of the gentlemen presenting this bill, and I presume the committee agrees with them—is that this reinsurance lessens the liability of the Government; that that is the purpose of it; and yet it increases the appropriation from $15,000,000 to $50,000,000. Why? For a very good reason, because it increases the liability of the Government; the bill itself does.

Mr. SNOOK. The theory of the War-Risk Insurance Department is——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know what the theory is——

Mr. SNOOK. The theory is that the increased amount is due to the increased amount of business.

Mr. MANN. I will explain it again.

Mr. SNOOK. I understand what the gentleman says. He does not need to explain it to me.

Mr. MANN. Evidently the gentleman does not understand it. I do not think he understands it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. If we insured only American vessels we would not have to greatly increase the amount of the appropriation, and we have a sufficient number of vessels to insure to make a reasonable spread of insurance, so that we would not be subjected to any great risk.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact, especially in view of the statement that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made, that there was one hearing that was not reported, and that was when we were discussing this subject. The bureau claims that this is absolutely necessary to spread the risk and help our Government.

Mr. MANN. I said that is what the bureau claimed. If the gentleman would pay me the respect of listening to my remarks—which he has not done—and then try to appreciate them, he would understand. I have stated that that is the claim of the bureau, but that is not the fact. Notwithstanding the claim of the bureau, we now have a sufficient spread of insurance in effect on American vessels, and the truth—and it is an absolute truth—that this is not for the purpose of lessening the liability of the Government is apparent in the fact that they have increased the appropriaion by more than 300 per cent. If we now have a liability in insuring American vessels and the real purpose of this bill is the one which was claimed by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, that they wanted to decrease the liability of the Government, they ought to decrease the appropriation instead of increase it.

Now what are the facts? The facts are that if we insured by this bureau a thousand American vessels and the English Government insured a thousand English vessels of the same value with the same rate of insurance, we would not lose, I think, probably by reinsuring their insurance and having them reinsure our insurance. There would probably be no change. But what are the real facts? Where we would have a thousand vessels to insure, they will have 10,000 to insure. They want us to carry their insurance. That is the truth about it. You might as well be truthful about these things.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman has any information about it, I will be glad to have it. I do not care for his interpretation.

Mr. SNOOK. According to the information we had before the committee the bureau does not wish that additional sum for the purpose of going into the business of insurance.

Mr. MANN. That is what they said, but it is not true.

Mr. SNOOK. If we have a risk of $2,000,000 on one ship, they want to reinsure one-half of that ship, so that if the ship is sunk we will not have that whole risk to pay. It is the same as in the case of fire insurance.

Mr. MANN. Surely, you have got to have a spread of insurance. Here is the fact: We now insure the American vessels, a small number in proportion to the number to be insured. The English insurers insure the English vessels, a very large number in proportion to ours. Now, what do they want us to do? They want us to carry half of the insurance of their vessels, and in return they will carry half of the insurance of our vessels; and no man who can reason can fail to see that we are increasing our liability, and not decreasing it. With an equal number of vessels, there would be no practical change in the liability; but we propose to reinsure the English vessels, the French vessels, and the Italian vessels; and if Switzerland gets into the war, according to one of the naval experts here on the floor some time ago, we might insure the Swiss vessels. [Laughter.] Now, the only justification for this bill——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is that the same navy that they were going to invite to send ships to the San Francisco exposition? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I believe we invited them to send their vessels to San Francisco. The only justification—and it may be that that is the justification—is that we are loaning England large sums of money; we are sending our ships and supplies abroad to help England. It is to our interest to have our supplies reach the other side. It may be that, as a matter of war necessity, we can afford to help England in this way. But to hide behind a subterfuge and say that it is to reduce our liability is what makes me a little hot under the collar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask time in which to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to answer me a question. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I stressed the proposition that we ought to try to induce additional vessels to come in and help us in this carrying trade. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think there is some wisdom in it?

Mr. MANN. I do not catch the point of the gentleman's question.

Mr. ADAMSON. If our vessels are too few to render the necessary service, and by insuring the French and English vessels we can induce the necessary vessels to come in and help us transport American supplies to our allies, does not the gentleman think there is some justification in that?

Mr. MANN. I just said there might be some justification on that ground.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is where I stand.

Mr. MANN. That may be. But I do not like to have the War-Risk Bureau people come to me and try to delude me into believing something that I know is not so.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the last suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ADAMSON] is the one that appeals most strongly to me. I do not think it is necessary in a governmental insurance company of this kind, formed purely as a war-risk measure, to conduct it entirely upon the lines of a commercial insurance company, and yet this plan has been remarkably successful and sound, tested by every test that would be applied to a company that had to preserve its capital and maintain the expenses of its business. This whole insurance business has been a complete and unqualified success. It has been a success measured by the earnings of the War-Risk Bureau, but it has been a bigger success when measured by relief given to American commerce. The gentleman must remember that when we passed this law cotton was rotting on the wharves and great cargoes were waiting at the seaboards that could not be moved because the commerce of the world was tied up by this sudden world-wide war. What was it that started the stream of commerce across the ocean? What was it that lifted the great cotton market from the "buy-a-bale" proposition to the present independent and prosperous condition it occupies? What was it that sent wheat and lumber across the ocean? Why it was relieving the stagnation of business caused by the lack of war-risk insurance. If we measure this War-Risk Bureau by either test—by the test of its own earnings or by the test of the remarkable advantage it has given to American commerce—then it has well justified its existence.

Here is a proposition which can be supported on broader grounds than that it will lessen the ultimate risk of each insurance. That is purely a technical and actuary standpoint. I have no doubt that it is sound, because the board having been sound on the other propositions I have no doubt they are sound on this. But it is desirable for a wider reason. The great help that we need to contribute now is to get supplies promptly to the Army in the field. We can not put men and guns on the front immediately in a number sufficient to influence the conduct of the war, but we can put men and supplies in the field. Everything that will encourage the sailing of a merchant vessel, that will render it more safe and certain, will add to the success of this war. If we can assume a part of the risk of the sailing of vessels under a friendly flag engaged in the same project that we are, if that will put more vessels on the ocean and send them abroad more promptly and with more confidence it is worthy of the risk it entails. I am not deceived any more than the gentleman from Illinois that we are lessening our risk. When insurance embarks in a larger measure it means a larger capital and a larger responsibility.

That is not the utlimate test. The ultimate test is whether the losses exceed the income, and that is not the case with this War-Risk Bureau. The losses are less than the income, and this enlarged work will be conducted in the same way. This is the most important project in the bill. We can with our unimpaired credit, the one great Nation of the world who has put her shoulder under the burden, assuming the risk and responsibility of merchant vessels going to sea. Every friendly vessel in the world is benefited, and so to-day we increase the scope of American commerce and increase the possibility of a successful end of the war.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman talks very fluently about the subject of war. Does the gentleman hold that causes for war of our Nation against the Imperial German Government are different or the same as those of the entente allies?

Mr. BORLAND. Our cause for war is peculiar to ourselves—the fact that they have been attempting to prevent us from the use of the oceans of the world. One of the fundamental features of the bill is that we are attempting to give freedom of the seas not only to American commerce but to the whole world.

Mr. NORTON. If the Imperial German Government to-morrow declared that she would not destroy any of our vessels on the high seas without notice, and would conform to the established rules of international law as they relate to the high seas, and would conform to the rights of notice and of search and seizure, and would make reparation for losses she has inflicted on our commerce, does the gentleman think that this Nation should then longer continue in the war?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman's question is purely hypothetical. The gentleman knows as well as I do that American rights are American rights, and that we are here to defend them.

Mr. NORTON. Is the gentleman afraid to answer the question?

Mr. BORLAND. No. I say that when American rights are safeguarded and the war is over, the gentleman's question is hypothetical, and he knows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have one minute more in order to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman anticipate the possibility of such a state of affairs as has been suggested by the gentleman from North Dakota until somebody whips Germany?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not assume that the gentleman from North Dakota is in the confidence of Germany. His question is purely hypothetical.

Mr. NORTON. Purely hypothetical, of course anybody knows that; but the gentleman is afraid to answer it.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I am not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has taken a wide range, and much has been said that is not relevant to this amendment. This provision for reinsurance presents a purely business proposition. In the Committee on Interstate Commerce Mr. DILLON asked Mr. Davey, member of the advisory board, this question:

> Mr. DILLON. I would like to ask one question, calling attention to section 3, on page 3, where there is a provision, beginning at line 18, which reads as follows: "insured by the Government of any country which is at war with an enemy of the United States." This provision relates to reinsurance, and I would like to know if England and Italy and Russia and France insure through governmental activities the same as we are doing?
> Mr. DAVEY. Yes, sir; they all do. I can not speak for Russia.
>
> Mr. DILLON. The Government itself insures?
> Mr. DAVEY. Yes, sir; France, Italy, Great Britain, and several of the neutral countries do, but I can not speak for Russia.

You will note from Mr. Davey's answer that the governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy carry war-risk insurance on their vessels like we do on vessels under the American flag.

The agencies through which this cooperative insurance may be effective are already in existence.

I can not imagine that if the War-Risk Bureau should engage in this reciprocal arrangement of reinsurance of foreign vessels and cargoes in return for a like insurance of vessels and cargoes under the American flag, that it would increase our liability. It would divide it, and it would not in any event increase it.

The purpose of this provision is not to help our allies any more than to help ourselves. The morning papers state that Italy will require a million tons of coal a month. She has not the ships in which to carry that coal to Italy. I am told coal costs as much as $100 a ton in Italy. Italy is our ally. Her aims and ours are the same in this war. If we can furnish five ships and she can furnish five ships, and those ships combined carry the coal from this country to Italy, and they reinsure our ships and we theirs, dividing the liability, is not that a sound business proposition? Is not that the principle invoked by the life and fire insurance companies? I confess I can not understand the attitude of the gentlemen who oppose this provision. This is purely a business proposition. We have not consulted our allies as regards this proposition; but recognizing conditions as they exist, and in the hope that by cooperation we can increase the tonnage, and can serve ourselves and our allies alike, and diminish the risk to ourselves, this provision has been written into the bill.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some line where there may be an end——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I should like to have the gentleman hurry up with his question.

Mr. NORTON. Where there may be an end to the call of our allies for help from the United States? We are loaning them money, we are sending troops over there; now they desire us to carry their insurance——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Our allies have not requested this provision. I want to disabuse the gentleman's mind on that.

Mr. NORTON. We are thrusting this on them, are we?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; we are not thrusting this on them. We are simply undertaking to give this board the power of exercising what is a sound economic principle in conducting our commerce, the business of this bureau, and promoting the interests of and at the same time be of service to our allies.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think we can not carry on our part of the war without this legislation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am not in sympathy with the gentleman's notions as revealed on this floor. I am entirely in sympathy with the great purposes of this war, and I want to go in to win, and I want to go in in entire good faith with our allies, and I have no sympathy with any man who does not. [Applause.]

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, this is only a business proposition. We want to protect American commerce, and we want to protect all the commerce carried on by American merchants. We want to protect not only the commerce carried on by American merchants in American ships, but we also want to protect all the commerce carried on by American merchants on the ships of other nations as well. This is what this section of the bill does. Suppose we say that our merchants were going to send a million tons of coal to Italy, and if we can carry only 200,000 tons on our American boats and 800,000 tons are carried on Italian, French, and British boats, in what way would the American merchant have the protection of insurance on any but the 200,000 tons unless this section is carried in the bill? There is no fire insurance company that would think of carrying a $10,000,000 risk in one policy and not reinsure at least nine-tenths of it. It is just exactly the same proposition here. If American merchants have a cargo worth $2,000,000, the United States might not want to carry a policy of $2,000,000 on the cargo in that one boat. The result would be that the United States would take only $1,000,000, and the American merchants who owned the cargo would have one-half of it uninsured, whereas if this section goes in the bill it allows us to carry $500,000 reinsurance with Great Britain, $500,000 reinsurance with France, $250,000, we will say, with Italy, and to carry $750,000 of the risk ourselves. In that way we are protecting the American merchants for $2,000,000, but are carrying only $750,000 of the risk ourselves. The same conditions might be necessary in order to protect adequately goods imported by our American merchants. Anyone who votes to strike out this section is not voting to help his own people. He is voting to do something that is absolutely going to hurt American commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge what will be the premium or rate charged for insurance?

Mr. ADAMSON. It will be commensurate with the estimated losses. It will be readjusted at various times, and an effort will be made to have it high enough to meet the losses.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the gentleman any recent estimate?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have not. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] may have.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman that up to May 31, 1917, the expenses were $56,756.33, the known losses $5,693,587.10, and the total amount of premiums collected $11,398,092.28.

Mr. AUSTIN. What I wish to know is this, What is it going to cost a seaman to insure his life under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are talking with reference to this reinsurance feature now.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am asking about the life insurance feature.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It will not cost the seaman anything. The vessel owner is required to insure the officers and seamen; that is, their clothing, and also to take out insurance on their lives.

Mr. AUSTIN. Naval officers are up against this proposition: The insurance companies of the United States have announced a rate of $100 per thousand on additional insurance during the period of the war, or $500 for carrying $5,000, which is a hardship on many of the younger naval officers; and if we can report legislation which will relieve the common sailor on a merchant vessel, why is it that we can not do something for the relief of the naval officers?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We are trying to do this now as regards the officers and men on merchant ships. I can well understand why the gentleman is in sympathy with the efforts to apply the same principle to officers and men on naval ships, as far as that is concerned, but that proposition is not before us in this bill.

Mr. ESCH. This fact would also enter with reference to naval officers, that if they are injured or crippled they are retired on retirement pay, and that does not apply to the officers and crews of merchant ships.

Mr. AUSTIN. And if a naval officer is killed and leaves a family the only relief for his widow under the law is a small pension.

Mr. ADAMSON. As the gentleman has asked me the question, I will remind him that a question in respect to naval officers would not come within the jurisdiction of our committee, and I think we are doing pretty well to consider the question that is now before us.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am in sympathy with the gentleman, but I am asking him why should we not take a further step in the interest of naval officers who are held up—there is no other term that expresses it—by a combination of insurance companies which says they must pay $100 for every additional thousand dollars carried on their lives?

Mr. ADAMSON. This will prevent that combination as against officers and crews on merchant vessels.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have a son in the Navy who is carrying an insurance policy and who now is confronted with the statement—although he made an application for an increase before the declaration of war—that he must pay an additional hundred dollars premium upon every thousand dollars. A young naval officer can not afford to do that. He can not furnish $500 over and above his expenses and the expenses of his family, if he is a man of family, to meet this demand, and therefore he must go into this war unable financially to protect the interests of his wife and children, and I think Congress ought to find a remedy to meet a situation of that kind and stand for the Army and the Navy Officers and men as against a combination of insurance companies.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. How long has he had the policy in effect?

Mr. AUSTIN. He has been carrying a policy for some time, and he asked for an increase and filed his application three days before the declaration of war, and the Travelers' Insurance Co.——

Mr. JAMES. They can not collect on an old policy.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Travelers' Insurance Co. refused to give him an increase unless he paid an additional hundred dollars on the thousand.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think also, while we are writing legislation of this kind that we ought to do something that will have in view the protection of the hundreds of thousands—nay, millions—of boys we are going to take by force from homes and transport across the sea, when they are getting only $30 a month and without receiving any insurance of any kind?

Mr. AUSTIN. We certainly should. We are now providing a proper, legitimate, and commendable piece of legislation protecting the men who are engaged in commerce in the merchant-marine service, and we should not stop there. It is not a question of personal interest with me, it is a question affecting every American Army and naval officer, sailor, and soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following amendment: Page 3, line 20, after the word "cargoes," insert the following: "Provided, That no such reinsurance shall be authorized for a period exceeding one year."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that they do not reinsure for a year. Insurance is just for the voyage, not for a year or a month.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask unanimous consent to close debate?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection. I merely want five minutes upon this amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], who has made a specialty of this War-Risk Bureau legislation and who has operated very successfully and skillfully through the powerful Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and who has brought in measures twice for increasing the capitalization of the War-Risk Bureau, first from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000, and then from $15,000,000 to $50,000,000, has indicated twice in the speech just made by him that this foreign reinsurance proposition is a business proposition. He made this statement twice, and it was picked up and reiterated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES], who speaks with some authority as an insurance man.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he does not think it pretty good business to clear 100 per cent in that bureau in the time it has been running?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that is very good. But the gentleman will observe that this bill is brought in now because the losses are very heavy and we must have more capitalization.

Mr. ADAMSON. And the premiums will be made higher, too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman observed from what was said yesterday and what is in the RECORD this morning that whereas this War-Risk Bureau was formed with a capital of $5,000,000 the losses up to date have been $6,000,000. That does not look much like making money, if you set your original capital up against your present loss. The real fact is that the losses are getting very heavy. We are losing our ships; Great Britain is losing her ships; and each day brings news that somehow or other escapes the censor that the submarines are playing havoc with shipping; and therefore the gentleman comes in under suggestion from the Secretary of the Treasury and the War-Risk Bureau, which never yet has published details as to the cargoes carried upon these ships, and proposes now that we shall appropriate $50,000,000 to prepare to make good our losses.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Recognizing the inedaquate number of our own ships for the purpose, and recognizing that we might secure the services of ships of other friendly nations to augment the United States service, if we can secure them as an original proposition by assisting in the insurance to carry our commerce, does not the gentleman think that is a sufficient reason for this?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman by quoting the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who a moment ago indicated that if we raised this insurance fund to $50,000,000 to insure foreign ships as well as our own we may insure 1,000 American ships and 10,000 foreign ships. Therefore our losses will be greater.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not the question. If we need the ships to carry commerce and we have not got them ourselves and can induce others to carry our commerce by insuring them, is it not wise for us to do it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman if we have so legislated, especially since this administration has been in power, to increase the merchant marine of the United States?

Mr. ADAMSON. The purpose of this commerce is to carry our products to the allies. That is the purpose of it; there is no disguising it. We have not got ships enough to do it. There is not any more danger of their sinking the other ships in that commerce than our own. The danger is exactly the same. If we can augment the number of our ships and secure ships of friendly nations to help us carry it by aiding in their insurance, are not we serving ourselves by doing it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be if it pertained solely to American ships, but if the losses are going to be greater on foreign ships than on American ships we are going to pay the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Why would it be greater? There is exactly the same risk and danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I will have to ask for more time, inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia consumed some of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have as much time as I took—about two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think about three minutes. The gentleman was so eloquent I hated to stop him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's question is always an argument, learned and brilliant, and I hesitated to impede his query, but the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. ADAMSON. I have to bear that character to fit well in the gentleman's speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I put it in my speech in order that it may be made a matter of record. I think very highly of the gentleman from Georgia and of his power and influence in this House. That is the reason I want to put him in juxtaposition just now with the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, can I get two more minutes, making it five, because the gentleman may want five minutes to answer?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman admits his speech needs no answer I will get him all the time.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in reference to the facts. Are not the ships proposed to be insured by us, so far as they are foreign ships, to carry American commerce? That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Such commerce as is going to the allies for their purposes or for ours.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. From our shores?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. These ships ply over exactly the same route that American ships ply over—that would be true?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not think so, because this paragraph states that the bureau now is to have authority to reinsure vessels of foreign, friendly flags and their cargoes. There is no limitation upon that, I believe. They could insure ships in the South American trade from England or they could be insured in the African trade from Italy. They could be insured generally, that is the idea.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. But they are to be utilized for American purposes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They ought to be, that is my judgment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And they are to carry these cargoes that American ships would carry if we had the American ships.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we are going to use governmental insurance they ought to be ships doing American business.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. They are carrying these cargoes that American ships would carry if we had them. Is not that part of the proposition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not the purpose of this paragraph.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is what I gathered from the gentleman from Georgia, and that is the reason I have been asking these questions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will simply say to the gentleman the section provides that the War-Risk Insurance Bureau may reinsure vessels of foreign friendly flags. There is no limitation on that.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman from Georgia a question in the gentleman's time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would have to get more time.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I will ask that the gentleman have more time. These ships are to carry the cargoes that American ships would carry if we had the American ships?

Mr. ADAMSON. Supplemental to our work.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And they would travel virtually the sea routes which our ships would travel if we had the ships?

Mr. ADAMSON. Exactly; and be subject to the same danger.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. If that is true, why should the foreign ships be subject to more risk than our own ships?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Our own loss would be greater.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia says this is a war proposition; that we want to go into this reinsurance business—I think I understand reinsurance, and I understand it is not settled in a day, but that it involves contracts and complications that extend over a series of years. I think I am familiar with the facts as to that. The gentleman from Georgia insists that we should, as a Nation, go into this war-risk insurance business with foreign ships on foreign business because of the war emergency. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], a little more frank, indicated twice, as I have stated, that this is a business proposition pure and simple.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think the gentleman thinks that I suffer in frankness. We want this insurance in order to help whip Germany.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I am in favor of whipping Germany as quickly as the gentleman is, and a lot quicker.

Mr. ADAMSON. I doubt it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We disagree as to this section. I would put a limitation on it so that these foreign contracts will cease sometime.

Mr. ADAMSON. Both grounds are good.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, the trouble with the gentlemen who are advocating this bill, and doing it patriotically from their point of view, is that they are in favor of a Government-ownership proposition wherein the United States shall furnish the capital to do business with foreign nations as well as ours. They say it is necessary to build up this war-risk insurance from $5,000,000 original capital to $50,000,000 proposed capital, in order that we shall do "business pure and simple" on the one hand and attend to the war emergency on the other. My fear is that unless we put a limitation on this foreign war business we will put the Government permanently in the insurance business and that we can not, by reason of the foreign complications that will ensue, extricate ourselves from that condition.

The gentlemen seem to think there are no independent insurance companies capable of doing this business. The fact is that there are plenty of insurance companies that could conduct this business and would take it. The fact is that there has not been a contract made by any company following the proceedings of the Council of National Defense in any of our preparedness measures that has not been insured by independent insurance companies. It has been a great year for independent insurance companies. Now, what do the gentlemen propose? They propose, first, to help our allies, which, I suppose, is popular, even though we are already helping them with our money and our life and blood. Are we to go on helping them permanently in their business losses? My point is that unless the limitation of a year or some other period is put upon the operation of this paragraph we will put out of business through a Government agency independent insurance companies in the United States and will do it solely for the benefit of independent insurance companies of other countries. In other words, it will establish now by the appropriation of this $50,000,000, to go largely into foreign business, a permanent Government agency which has been growing strongly upon us during the last two years. We will establish it in such a way that it will be practically impossible to dislodge it. Whether we want to do that or not is a question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman name one American insurance company that writes war-risk insurance?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I could name several of them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Name one of them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not the names at my fingers' ends now, but I have communications from several of them indicating there was no necessity for this War-Risk Insurance Bureau at all. I have in my hand a report from one of the large surety companies which has been doing an American war-risk insurance business; and it has had the most profitable business of its existence, and it speaks of the prosperity of all other insurance companies in this land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HELVERING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On May 29, 1917:

H. R. 14. An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 328. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect to car service, and for other purposes.

On June 1, 1917:

S. J. Res. 66. Joint resolution making immediately available moneys appropriated for the investigation of the pneumatic mail-tube service in the act approved March 3, 1917.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The committee resumed its session.

Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That there is hereby added to such act a new section, to be known as section 3a, to read as follows:

"SEC. 3a. That whenever it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the effecting of such insurance is desirable in the national interest in the case of vessels engaged in any trade, the owner of every American merchant vessel engaged in such trade shall insure the master, officers, and crew of such vessel against loss of life or personal injury from war risks as well as for compensation during detention by an enemy of the United States following capture.

"Such insurance shall be effected either with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance or in insurance companies, and on terms satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Such insurance shall provide, and the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is authorized to write policies so providing—

"(a) In case of death, permanent disability which prevents the person injured from performing any and every kind of duty pertaining to his occupation, or the loss of both hands, both arms, both feet, both legs, or both eyes, for the payment of an amount equivalent to one year's earnings, or to twelve times the monthly earnings of the insured, as fixed in the articles for the voyage (hereinafter referred to as the principal sum), but in no case shall such amount be more than $5,000 or less than $1,500.

"(b) In case of any of the following losses, for the payment of the percentage of the principal sum indicated in the following tables:

"One hand, 50 per cent;
"One arm, 65 per cent;
"One foot, 50 per cent;
"One leg, 65 per cent;
"One eye, 45 per cent;
"Total destruction of hearing, 50 per cent;

"That the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance may include in its policy undertakings to pay specified percentages of the principal sum for other losses or disabilities; and

"(c) In case of detention by an enemy of the United States, following capture, for the payment during the continuance of such detention of compensation at the same rate as the earnings of the insured immediately preceding such detention, to be determined in substantially the same manner as provided in subdivision (a) of this section.

"The aggregate payments under this section in respect to any one person shall not exceed the amount of the principal sum.

"Payments provided for in this section shall be made only to the master, officer, or member of the crew concerned, except that a payment for loss of life shall be made to the estate of the insured for distribution to his family free from liability of debt, and payment on account of detention by an enemy following capture shall be made to dependents of the person detained, if designated by him.

"No claim under this section shall be valid unless made by the master, officer, or member of the crew concerned, or his estate, or a person designated under this section, within two years after the date on which the President suspends the operations of this act in so far as it authorizes insurance by the United States."

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNOOK offers the following amendment: Page 5, line 6, after the word "eyes," insert the words "or any two thereof."

Mr. SNOOK. The intention of this is to make it so that the combination of any two of the disabilities—the loss of an arm, the loss of a foot, or the loss of an eye, or the loss of a leg—shall be a loss of the two. It is practically the same as in the Ohio compensation law.

Mr. MANN. I suppose we might accept the dictum of the Ohio Legislature as to the meaning of the act, but certainly it takes a wild imagination to give it the meaning which the gentleman proposes.

Mr. SNOOK. If the gentleman can better the language, I would be very glad to have him do it.

Mr. MANN. I know I could, but I am not prepared to do it.
Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman understands the intention?
Mr. MANN. I understand the purpose of it.
Mr. SNOOK. It can be cleared up in conference.
Mr. ESCH. Will it not be better, at the end of line 5, after the word "hands," to say "one arm and one leg"?
Mr. SNOOK. But then, you see, it would not cover the whole combination. It means the combination of any two of these.
Mr. JAMES. Practically every workingman's compensation act takes care of one arm and one leg.
Mr. SNOOK. That is what I am trying to do.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK].
The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAGSDALE:
Page 4, line 22, after the word "capture," insert: "That the commanding officer of each company of soldiers in the service of the United States Government while being transported on the sea shall insure his officers and soldiers on the same terms and in like amount as the officers and crews of vessels."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. It is not germane to this bill at all.
Mr. MANN. Make the point of order.
Mr. ADAMSON. I will make it.
Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes a point of order against the amendment. The bill among other things authorizes insurance against loss of life and personal injury on account of war risks and so forth on American merchant vessels. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] proposes to include insurance for officers and soldiers of the Army in like amount as the officers and crews of merchant vessels. The Chair thinks it is clear that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina is not germane to the provision now under consideration. While the two propositions may be related to some extent, they are in different classes. This is an individual proposition to insure the lives of certain persons upon merchant vessels. It has been held a number of times and there are a number of precedents to the effect that it is not in order to amend one individual proposition by another individual proposition, even though the two may belong to the same class. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.
Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.
Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. CRISP, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2133) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.
Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.
The previous question was ordered.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the amendments will be put in gross.
The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.
The amendments were agreed to.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.
The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE ITALIAN MISSION.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings during the recess to-day may be printed in the RECORD in the appropriate place.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the proceedings that took place during the recent recess of the House be printed in the appropriate place in the RECORD. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. SMALL. When the House adjourned yesterday evening by unanimous consent it was agreed that when it adjourned to-day it should adjourn until next Wednesday at noon, and that what would have been in order on Monday should be in order on Wednesday. Now, the inquiry I wish to make is this: If on Wednesday, after the Unanimous Consent Calendar has been exhausted, with all that that calendar includes, would that which would be in order on Calendar Wednesday follow?
Mr. ADAMSON. It was decided yesterday.
Mr. MANN. The Speaker yesterday put the request that the proceedings of Calendar Wednesday should follow the proceedings in order on Monday.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the case.
Mr. SMALL. That answers my inquiry.
Mr. MANN. There is no question about that. If the gentleman wants to dispense with Calendar Wednesday following, I have no objection.
Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. BORLAND. If any other legislation is called up at that time proper to be called up, it would come up automatically on Thursday morning following the special order made by the former action of the House?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would depend largely on the kind of legislation and the condition existing when the House adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the previous order, until Wednesday, June 6, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 4, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we bless Thee for the assurance that above us, where all power is lodged, there is a gentle hand and a loving heart. The attitude of God toward us is that of fatherly care and pity and compassion. We bless Thee that Thou dost work through men against fate and force and death; that Thou dost establish through men Thy kingdom in the earth.

We pray Thy blessing upon us this day, O God of light and life and power. We remember to-day those who are coming into our city bringing with them the glorious traditions of the past, coming with a friendly spirit and with loyalty to a common country, coming with inspiration and with power to cheer those who stand in the front rank of the conflict of this our day.

God bless the men of the past who have borne their part in struggle and strife, and in their eventide may it be light. Guide us this day in the discharge of our duties. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a copy of a resolution passed at a peace meeting held in the city of Chicago, Ill., one week ago yesterday, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

CHICAGO PERMANENT CONFERENCE ON TERMS OF PEACE,
Chicago, Ill., May 31, 1917.

HON. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am directed to send you a copy of the following resolutions, passed at a citizens' mass meeting held in the Auditorium Sunday afternoon, May 27. This meeting was attended by 4,500 persons, and more than 5,000 were turned away at the doors.

Respectfully,

ARTHUR FISHER, Secretary.

Resolutions unanimously adopted at mass meeting in Auditorium Theater, Chicago, Sunday, May 27, under the auspices of the Chicago Permanent Conference on Terms of Peace.

Whereas the critical position of the new Russian democracy of the revision of Russia's war aims requires an immediate reexamination of the peace terms of the entire entente; and

Whereas a democracy can not continue a war free from the burden of responsibility therefor without declaring its own peace terms definite enough for all the world to understand and fair enough for all the world to accept and without securing corresponding declarations from those nations with which it finds itself in fact allied: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this gathering of citizens of Chicago, moved by devotion to their country and the principle of world democracy, urge their Government to make a clear and definite statement of the terms of peace proposed by the United States and by its European allies; and be it further

Resolved, That these terms be in accord with the principles of international conduct expressed in President Wilson's utterances, that "every people should be left free to determine its own policy, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened"; that "peace, if it is to come with healing in its wings and come to stay," must, first of all, be "a peace between equals," a peace "based upon a common participation in a common benefit"; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President and to the Members of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment, I wish to say that I am not in sympathy with the resolution. It asks for terms of peace to be stated by the Government at this time. Peace will be concluded by the United States in this war through the Department of State and the President. I think war can be waged and peace concluded only by organized government, and not by such meetings as this held in the city of Chicago.

I regard peace meetings held in this way as obstacles to the prosecution of the war and as impediments in the way of the President and his constitutional advisers in effectively conducting the war. I regard the war entered into by the United States as a righteous war. I believe that it should be prosecuted, and ought to be supported, by the people through the constituted authorities; that this peace meeting in the city of Chicago will not help the conclusion of a just peace; that so far as it seeks to secure a declaration of terms on which peace may be concluded it is an erroneous and misguided effort. It will encourage the public enemy and delay peace rather than hasten it. I appeal to my countrymen to unite our forces to protect and defend our country against a powerful and aggressive enemy instead of giving them strength by promoting divisions among our people.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cheswold, Kent County, Del., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented a petition of the congregation of the Grace Lutheran Church of North Tonawanda, N. Y., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask immediate consideration by the Senate of the concurrent resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

SPEECH OF SENATOR JAS. HAMILTON LEWIS.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an authentic copy of an extract from an address delivered recently in Manchester, N. H., by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I desire unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, pardon me. There was just enough rumble around me that I did not catch the observation of the able Senator from Ohio. The request of the Senator from Ohio I did not catch.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was to print your speech in the RECORD.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no objection to compliment the RECORD in that manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. HARDING. I am sending the manuscript to the desk, and I have not a word to tender or any thought to make in reply to the speech at this time nor even to call attention to the unfortunate contretemps, inferentially, in the result of the election following the speech. I only wanted to state that I think in making the world safe for democracy we ought to make a contribution in our own country by making democracy safe for the American people by putting patriotism above partisanship in times like these. I desire to offer no further comment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have not seen the excerpt which the able Senator from Ohio tenders. It is true that I spoke in New Hampshire. It was at a congressional election. I spoke for the candidate designated as the Democratic candidate. I regret he was not elected.

I do not know what particular element in this particular speech the able Senator from Ohio would have accentuated. However, this much I am pleased to add, that following my speech in New Hampshire in behalf of the Democratic candidate the able Senator from Ohio addressed the same constituency in behalf of the candidate for the Republicans; and if the candidate called Democratic was defeated it is but a natural inference that the result was due to the speech of the eminent Senator from Ohio. [Laughter.]

I could not allow this compliment which he does me at this time of putting my speech in the RECORD to go without a due recognition that whatever weight it may have had in my favor seems to have been wholly offset by the splendid and evident value of the speech made by the eminent Senator from Ohio now tendering my speech.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I can not allow the courteous Senator from Illinois to outdo me in generosity. I will accept the responsibility for the result in New Hampshire. [Laughter.]

But since the matter has come up for discussion, I will call the attention of the Senate and the distinguished Senator from Illinois to one paragraph of his speech which has particularly impelled me to place it in the RECORD as an indication of the tendency of popular government even in a difficult time like this. The eloquent and forceful Senator from Illinois spoke as follows:

The question for you, then, is, Which way? Are you for America or for Germany? Are you for the President or for the Kaiser? Are you for your country or for its enemies? Your ballot is the only answer you can give.

My comment, Mr. President, on the paragraph is that, after the administration has been so cordially and so effectively supported in both branches of Congress by Members, without any regard to their political affiliations, the answer of the people of the first district of New Hampshire, after this succinct statement of the Senator from Illinois, is rather a misfortune than a matter of congratulation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has now made clear that his purpose in presenting this resolution was to show that a challenge had been made to the first district of New Hampshire to set forth by their ballot whether they represented this country in standing by the President or whether they would be considered as being opposed to the President by electing a gentleman who is opposed to those who were in favor of the President. The Senator, I take it, has for his purpose to present to the Senate that, notwithstanding there was a petition made to the people of the first New Hampshire district to stand by the President, and that, as an inducement to them, it was represented that to send a Representative to the House of Representatives who could be construed as representing an adverse sentiment to the President, would be treated abroad as being favorable to the enemies of America.

Mr. President, it was my intention when I made that speech to present very clearly to the country that which I now repeat, that in an hour like this, when the President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief of the armies, is waging a war against the enemies of America, the man who presents himself as representing the President stands for the things for which the President is fighting, and that the man who stands against the President stands against the things for which America is fighting. I made the issue.

I deplore, sir, that that constituency could not accept it as such; and I regret all the more that my eminent friend from Ohio, by calling attention to the specific issue which I raised, and now inviting the attention of the Senate to the result of the election, could accentuate before the country, when the issue was directly put before this American constituency as to whether their ballots should be free from partisanship sufficient to be for the President or against the President, that they chose to be against the President and for the Kaiser, or that they chose to be against America and for Germany.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. If, on the other hand, Mr. President, such was not their idea and such was not their ideal, and if it be not true, sir, that the eminent Senator desired to present such as his object, then it must be that he wishes to show that fact, notwithstanding the plea is made upon the ground I did make it, this constituency answered me by denying the plea and deciding against the plea, and deciding for the things which I said they should decide against—if that be not the object of the able Senator, I am unable to see, then, what his object could be.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. If, Mr. President, my eminent friend from Ohio finds a satisfaction in recording upon the RECORD that any constituency of this country chose to accept the challenge, and then decided in the challenge against their country or for a conclusion which can be construed to be against the President and against America—if my honorable friend from Ohio can find consolation in such a victory, I must congratulate his capacity to find joy wherein I only can find grief. I now yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Illinois to illumine the Senate on his process of reasoning, whereby he concludes that a Democratic nominee for Congress is for the President while the nominee of the party to which I belong is against the President, in view of the course of legislation in this body and in the other House during the last few months?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the premises of my able friend were well founded I should be glad to say that I could not justify them. I have not charged that the party called Republican in this body or in another body of Congress was against America; I have not charged that any Republican, because of being such, was against the country; I have not charged anywhere, nor could I, that a great body of them have not lent splendid aid and noble encouragement to the undertakings of the administration in carrying out this unfortunate, but necessary, conflict.

If my able friend had paused to have read my speech and have understood its purpose, he would have observed that I called the attention of that constituency to what Europe would say on the result, which was that one of those candidates being a Democrat, representing the administration for which President Wilson stood, and the other gentleman being a Republican and opposing the Democracy, the result would be construed abroad to mean encouragement of those who were opposed to the President, those who were opposing his policy, and would be construed to mean a victory for Germany against the President, a victory for the Kaiser against the country, in this, that as it was the very first election since war had been declared, and that, if the result was to be against one who was supposed to be a member of the President's party, it would receive the very construction that I put upon it in that address.

I say now that whatever construction may be put upon it in any land, there can be but one—and I deplore it—and that is that the splendid and patriotic constituency of the great State of New Hampshire decided against a follower and a supporter of the President; and, as the only issues before the country at this time are and were whether they were with the President in the great conflict, the verdict must be, so far as Europe is concerned, that they were not.

Therefore, Mr. President, if the able Senator will read the address complete, he will realize that the assault to which he alludes was never made; also, the Senator will observe that the very conclusion which I drew then is capable now of the same conclusion to be drawn.

I, in conclusion, say, regretting that the time of the Senate should be taken upon the matter, I still deplore that in contests such as there were in New Hampshire there could not have been a line drawn by that discriminating constituency as to what the effect of an election of that kind would be in the land of our enemies. It was that I sought to accentuate, and it is that which again I emphasize——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I rise to ask the Senator from Ohio if he would not be willing to have included in the RECORD the entire extract which the Senator from Illinois sent to the Boston papers; at least that which the Boston papers printed of his speech? I think it would be fair to the Senator from Illinois and would give a complete understanding to those who read it of the words and evidently of the intention of that Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. The suggestion meets with my approval, Mr. President.

Mr. HARDING. The premise to which the Senator from Illinois makes allusion is contained in the reported copy of his speech, and I shall be very glad to have it included, and so intended. My purpose has been very largely inspired by the thought that perhaps, while we are elevating the world, as I hope we may, we shall contribute something to the good fortune of our own land if, as partisans in our political contests, we are a little more considerate of one another and a little more frank and sincere in addressing our appeals to the constituencies of this land.

The extract from the speech of Mr. LEWIS is as follows:

There is no issue of Republican or Democratic Party in this contest. The issue is, Will the citizens of the Manchester, N. H., district stand by the President of the United States in his effort to maintain a war for democracy and justice, and give him a supporter in Congress who will support his policies and hold up his hands? Or will this district select a gentleman of whom it could be said he was an opponent of the policies of the President and of whom hereafter throughout the whole world, it will be said, was elected upon the issue of dishonoring the President and defeating America? If the candidate representing the cause of the President is defeated, it will not matter what reasons may be given here at home. Through all the world it will be said that in the first election—in the first contest—where the issue was raised in all America as to whether the people of the country were with the President, were with the war, and were supporting the cause, that the New Hampshire district was the first to answer, and that the Manchester, N. H., district replied "No," and by its verdict told the civilized world that it was against the war, against the President, against America—was for Prussianism and was for the defeat of the United States by her enemies, and that loyal New Hampshire voted disloyalty to the American Government for the first time in its life.

The question for you, then, is, Which way? Are you for America or for Germany? Are you for the President or for the Kaiser? Are you for your country or for its enemies? Your ballot is the only answer you can give.

The support of the war and the issues of the war is to the honor of New Hampshire. To do otherwise is to dishonor your State and to hold yourselves up before the country as citizens disloyal to the cause and deserters from your flag.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course I do not intend to object to putting this controversy of the stump into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I submit that it ought not to be taken as a precedent to be followed. If every time two doughty champions encountering each other in the political forum proceed to hurl the harmless javelins of satire, to strike with the bloodless swords of sound, or to attack with fire of unconsuming eloquence, all they have said is to be laboriously recited and solemnly preserved of record, our sessions will be endless, and the poor old CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will become long beyond reading and stupid beyond endurance.

I have always understood that a Senator, once he has reached the headwaters of the creek, or arrived at the crossroads, is permitted to shed his dignity along with his toga, and to "go to" any political controversy in the old-fashioned style of the hustings. I was particularly impressed with that fact when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], who has just filed the bill of complaint against the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], hied him to the State of Missouri last fall and paid his respects to me. I never thought it was necessary to bring the controversy into this forum in order to try out the question as to the truth of the charges he then and there made. I really think the Senator from Ohio is so much of a free lance and goes so much up and down the earth and into the territory of other Senators seeking scalps that he ought not to be supersensitive about a little speech that was made over in New Hamphsire, a domain that is foreign to him, as it is to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if he does not think it would make a difference if the recognized representative and spokesman of the administration went into a State after having carefully prepared and sent to the press the remarks which he intended to make, thus indicating that their purport had been reached after deliberation?

Mr. REED. Well, possibly so; but a similar argument might be advanced for preserving in the RECORD all that is said when some distinguished Senator running for the Presidency visits the various States and there delivers himself of wise or otherwise statements. There have been numerous examples of that kind, yet we have not generally been willing to embalm their remarks at the expense of cumbering the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. New Hampshire did her duty and is satisfied.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I believe there is a very general wish in the Senate to adjourn over until Friday. It is impossible to do so, as we can not adjourn for more than three days at a time. So I am going to submit a motion to adjourn until to-morrow; and then to-morrow I shall submit a motion that the Senate adjourn until Friday.

I will say, Mr. President, in explanation of this proposed course, that a great many Senators desire to give the time to a study of the revenue bill which is now being considered by the Finance Committee. They want time to consider and study that measure, and have requested me to make this motion so as to give them that opportunity.

In addition, Mr. President, the Confederate Veterans are having a reunion in the city, and a great many of us desire to have an opportunity to show some honor to them. The most important day of the reunion will be Thursday. For these reasons I felt that it would be well for the Senate to adjourn over until Friday, but as we can not do so I now move that the Senate adjourn, and to-morrow I shall move that the Senate adjourn until Friday. I submit the motion, Mr. President, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the motion to enable me to make a statement?

Mr. MARTIN. I will withhold the motion for the Senator to make his statement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have been exceedingly solicitous to bring to a conclusion the unfinished business; which is the bill for the allowance of priorities and preferences in traffic as a matter of war emergency. I should like to dispose of the bill to-day, unless I am led to understand there is such opposition to it as would prevent the conclusion of its consideration to-day. I will ask the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who has indicated that he wishes time for the consideration of the measure, whether he does not think that we can consider this matter to-day and conclude our action regarding it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I can speak only for myself. I think this bill embraces an astounding proposition. It is inconceivable to me that the Senate would pass it.

I think it ought to have the most serious consideration and the fullest deliberation. It transfers to the President the entire control of the transportation system of the country. As I read it, he can direct what shall be hauled and what shall not be hauled. He can practically control the prices of the hauls. A body of railroad men are required to be here to obey his orders, subject to criminal prosecution.

Existing rules and charges for transportation are subject to suspension. The consequent injuries to the railroads from inability to discharge their normal liabilities to the public seem to be subject to adjustment, and are to be made the subject of compensation, probably, by the National Government.

The bill is so far-reaching that I have not been quite able yet to grasp it. I have not had an opportunity to take it off by myself quietly and study it to find out what it does mean. I see enough upon the surface to feel that it should receive the most careful consideration of the Senate, and I should think there would be many Senators who would hesitate greatly before they would support it.

I do not know just what it is, but it seems to be a bill to place heretofore unknown powers of apparently complete transportation control in the President.

I do not understand that the President has had any special railroad training for the management of all the railroads in the United States. To be sure, the bill authorizes him to select somebody else, but I do not know that he has had any experience in selecting capable railroad men. He is also to fix the compensation for the men he selects. The whole matter of compensation and selection seems to be in his hands.

As I said, I may be inaccurate in my suggestion of the scope of this measure, and I hope I am. I hope my mind has been unduly excited as I read it, and that it does not mean nearly as much to me, upon not too careful a study, as it seems to mean.

If we are to transfer the railroads entirely into Government control, it occurs to me that we ought ourselves to consider the men who are to manage them, and to go somewhat more into detail as to compensation and as to the possible losses. I see no occasion now to subject the transportation system of the country to complete operation by the Government.

Surely, if the railroads are to be operated under Government control, we should settle in detail some of the policies and manner of operation.

The Senator really, however, asked me whether I thought we could vote upon this measure to-day. I can only speak for myself. I would only be ready to vote against it to-day and to urge every Senator to vote against it also.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 5, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 5, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in all of our work we acknowledge Thee. We come before Thee with reverent hearts, and asking Thy blessing upon us. Thy name has made us great. Under the guidance of the revealed will of God we look out upon the fate of a Nation under the inspiration of truth, and with the courage that comes from a conscience void of offense. We have been speaking to the nations with a voice of moral sympathy and helpfulness and pence.

To-day the great Nation calls to the colors millions of men to look upon the uncertain fate of the morrow. We bless Thee that, as we call them to the service of the Nation, they can come following the flag with a clear conscience, with a devotion to the truth, with the light of a blessed ideal before them. Guard, O God our Father, these men who serve in the trying fields that lie just before us. Grant that about them there may ever be the protecting arm of the God of our fathers. As Thou hast brought us through the uncertain paths of the past to this glorious day, lead us on to the accomplishment of Thy great purpose in us as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Townsend, Del., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions unanimously adopted by the Southern Society of Washington, D. C., at a regular meeting, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Southern Society of Washington, D. C., United States of America, at a regular meeting:

McDowell's stirring account of the struggles of the people of Russia for liberty and the cause of democracy, which resulted in the greatest and most remarkable revolution of the world's history; and

"Whereas the members of the society desire to express their sympathy for and admiration of the people of the great Russian nation in their marvelous work: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the members of the Southern Society of Washington extend their most cordial greetings to the people of all the Russias, and express and record their profoundest sympathy for their brothers and sisters of that vast country in their great struggle for liberty and self-government, and bid them Godspeed in the successful culmination of their memorable efforts in the establishment of a 'government of the people, by the people, for the people.'"

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

except for mechanical, scientific, sacramental, and medicinal purposes, under proper regulation by Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 44).

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit the conference report on the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The conference report is as follows:

R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"TITLE I.

"ENFORCEMENT OF NEUTRALITY.

"SECTION 1. During a war in which the United States is a neutral Nation, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, may withhold clearance from or to any vessel, domestic or foreign, which is required by law to secure clearance before departing from port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, or, by service of formal notice upon the owner, master, or person in command or having charge of any domestic vessel not required by law to secure clearances before so departing, to forbid its departure from port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any such vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, is about to carry fuel, arms, ammunition, men, supplies, dispatches, or information to any warship, tender, or supply ship of a foreign belligerent nation in violation of the laws, treaties, or obligations of the United States under the law of nations; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart.

"SEC. 2. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, the President, or any person thereunto authorized by him, may detain any armed vessel owned wholly or in part by American citizens, or any vessel, domestic or foreign (other than one which has entered the ports of the United States as a public vessel), which is manifestly built for warlike purposes or has been converted or adapted from a private vessel to one suitable for warlike use, until the owner or master, or person having charge of such vessel, shall furnish proof satisfactory to the President, or to the person duly authorized by him, that the vessel will not be employed by the said owners, or master, or person having charge thereof, to cruise against or commit or attempt to commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with which the United States is at peace, and that the said vessel will not be sold or delivered to any belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, by them or any of them, within the jurisdiction of the United States, or, having left that jurisdiction, upon the high seas.

"SEC. 3. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States.

"SEC. 4. During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation, in addition to the facts required by sections 4197, 4198, and 4200 of the Revised Statutes to be set out in the masters' and shippers' manifests before clearance will be issued to vessels bound to foreign ports, each of which sections of the Revised Statutes is hereby declared to be and is continued in full force and effect, every master or person having charge or command of any vessel, domestic or foreign, whether requiring clearance or not, before departure of such vessel from port shall deliver to the collector of customs for the district wherein such vessel is then located a statement duly verified by oath, that the cargo or any part of the cargo is or is not to be delivered to other vessels in port or to be transshipped on the high seas and, if it is to be so delivered or transshipped, stating the kind and quantities and the value of the total quantity of each kind of article so to be delivered or transshipped, and the name of the person, corporation, vessel, or Government, to whom the delivery or transshipment is to be made; and the owners, shippers, or consignors of the cargo of such vessel shall in the same manner and under the same conditions deliver to the collector like statements under oath as to the cargo or the parts thereof laden or shipped by them, respectively.

"SEC. 5. Whenever it appears that the vessel is not entitled to clearance or whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that the additional statements under oath required in the foregoing section are false, the collector of customs for the district in which the vessel is located may, subject to review by the Secretary of Commerce, refuse clearance to any vessel, domestic or foreign, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, forbid the departure of the vessel from the port or from the jurisdiction of the United States; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for the vessel to depart.

"SEC. 6. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this title, shall take, or attempt or conspire to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 7. Whoever, being a person belonging to the armed land or naval forces of a belligerent nation or belligerent faction of any nation and being interned in the United States, in accordance with the law of nations, shall leave or attempt to leave said jurisdiction, or shall leave or attempt to leave the limits of internment in which freedom of movement has been allowed, without permission from the proper official of the United States in charge, or shall willfully overstay a leave of absence granted by such official, shall be subject to arrest by any marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, or by the military or naval authorities thereof, and shall be returned to the place of internment and there confined and safely kept for such period of time as the official of the United States in charge shall direct; and whoever, within the jurisdiction of the United States and subject thereto, shall aid or entice any interned person to escape or attempt to escape from the jurisdiction of the United States, or from the limits of internment prescribed, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States or of any of its possessions, knowingly begins or sets on foot or provides or prepares a means for or furnishes the money for, or who takes part in, any military or naval expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States is at peace, shall be fined not more than $3,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.'

"SEC. 9. That the President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"SEC. 10. Section 15 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 15. It shall be lawful for the President to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia thereof, as he may deem necessary to compel any foreign vessel to depart from the United States or any of its possessions in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it ought not to remain, and to detain or prevent any foreign vessel from so departing in all cases in which, by the law of nations or the treaties of the United States, it is not entitled to depart.'

"SEC. 11. The joint resolution approved March 4, 1915, 'To empower the President to better enforce and maintain the neutrality of the United States,' and any act or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this title are hereby repealed.

"TITLE VI.

"SEIZURE OF ARMS AND OTHER ARTICLES INTENDED FOR EXPORT.

"SECTION 1. Whenever an attempt is made to export or ship from or take out of the United States, any arms or munitions of war, or other articles, in violation of law, or whenever there shall be known or probable cause to believe that any such arms or munitions of war, or other articles, are being or are intended to be exported, or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors, inspectors of customs, and marshals, and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other person duly authorized for the purpose by the President, may seize and detain any articles or munitions of war about to be exported or shipped from, or taken out of the United States, in violation of law, and the vessels or vehicles containing the same, and retain possession thereof until released or disposed of as hereinafter directed. If upon due inquiry as hereinafter provided, the property seized shall appear to have been about to be so unlawfully exported, shipped from, or taken out of the United States, the same shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the person making any seizure under this title to apply, with due diligence, to the judge of the district court of the United States, or to the judge of the United States district court of the Canal Zone, or to the judge of a court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place within which the seizure is made, for a warrant to justify the further detention of the property so seized, which warrant shall be granted only on oath or affirmation showing that there is known or probable cause to believe that the property seized is being or is intended to be exported or shipped from or taken out of the United States in violation of law; and if the judge refuses to issue the warrant, or application therefor is not made by the person making the seizure within a reasonable time, not exceeding 10 days after the seizure, the property shall forthwith be restored to the owner or person from whom seized. If the judge is satisfied that the seizure was justified under the provisions of this title and issues his warrant accordingly, then the property shall be detained by the person seizing it until the President, who is hereby expressly authorized so to do, orders it to be restored to the owner or claimant, or until it is discharged in due course of law on petition of the claimant, or on trial of condemnation proceedings, as hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 3. The owner or claimant of any property seized under this title may, at any time before condemnation proceedings have been instituted, as hereinafter provided, file his petition for its restoration in the district court of the United States, or the district court of the Canal Zone, or the court of first instance in the Philippine Islands, having jurisdiction over the place in which the seizure was made, whereupon the court shall advance the cause for hearing and determination with all possible dispatch, and, after causing notice to be given to the United States attorney for the district and to the person making the seizure, shall proceed to hear and decide whether the property seized shall be restored to the petitioner or forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 4. Whenever the person making any seizure under this title applies for and obtains a warrant for the detention of the property, and (a) upon the hearing and determination of the petition of the owner or claimant restoration is denied, or (b) the owner or claimant fails to file a petition for restoration within 30 days after the seizure, the United States attorney for the district wherein it was seized, upon direction of the Attorney General, shall institute libel proceedings in the United States district court or the district court of the Canal Zone or the court of first instance of the Philippine Islands having jurisdiction over the place wherein the seizure was made, against the property for condemnation; and if, after trial and hearing of the issues involved, the property is condemned, it shall be disposed of by sale, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, paid into the Treasury.

"SEC. 5. The proceedings in such summary trials upon the petition of the owner or claimant of the property seized, as well as in the libel cases herein provided for, shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in such libel cases, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States: Provided, That upon the payment of the costs and legal expenses of both the summary trials and the libel proceedings herein provided for, and the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient bond in an amount double the value of the property seized, conditioned that it will not be exported or used or employed contrary to the provisions of this title, the court, in its discretion, may direct that it be delivered to the owners thereof or to the claimants thereof.

"SEC. 6. Except in those cases in which the exportation of arms and munitions of war or other articles is forbidden by proclamation or otherwise by the President, as provided in section 1 of this title, nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with any trade in such commodities, conducted with any foreign port or place whatsoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this title, under the law of nations, or under the treaties or conventions entered into by the United States, or under the laws thereof.

"SEC. 7. Upon payment of the costs and legal expenses incurred in any such summary trial for possession or libel proceedings, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order the release and restoration to the owner or claimant, as the case may be, of any property seized or condemned under the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 8. The President may employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

"SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

"SEC. 2. Any person who shall export, ship, or take out, or deliver or attempt to deliver for export, shipment, or taking out, any article in violation of this title, or of any regulation or order made hereunder, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and any article so delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, or so attempted to be delivered or exported, shipped, or taken out, shall be seized and forfeited to the United States; and any officer, director, or agent of a corporation who participates in any such violation shall be liable to like fine or imprisonment, or both.

"SEC. 3. Whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that any vessel, domestic or foreign, is about to carry out of the United States any article or articles in violation of the provisions of this title, the collector of customs for the district in which such vessel is located is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to review by the Secretary of Commerce, to refuse clearance to any such vessel, domestic or foreign, for which clearance is required by law, and by formal notice served upon the owners, master, or person or persons in command or charge of any domestic vessel for which clearance is not required by law, to forbid the departure of such vessel from the port, and it shall thereupon be unlawful for such vessel to depart. Whoever, in violation of any of the provisions of this section, shall take, or attempt to take, or authorize the taking of any such vessel, out of port or from the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and, in addition, such vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture, equipment, and her forbidden cargo shall be forfeited to the United States.

"SEC. 6. If the judge or commissioner is thereupon satisfied of the existence of the grounds of the application or that there is probable cause to believe their existence, he must issue a search warrant, signed by him with his name of office, to a civil officer of the United States duly authorized to enforce or assist in enforcing any law thereof, or to a person so duly authorized by the President of the United States, stating the particular grounds or probable cause for its issue and the names of the persons whose affidavits have been taken in support thereof, and commanding him forthwith to search the person or place named, for the property specified, and to bring it before the judge or commissioner.

"SEC. 7. A search warrant may in all cases be served by any of the officers mentioned in its direction, but by no other person, except in aid of the officer on his requiring it, he being present and acting in its execution.

"SEC. 8. The officer may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, or any part of a house, or anything therein, to execute the warrant, if, after notice of his authority and purpose, he is refused admittance.

"SEC. 9. He may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, for the purpose of liberating a person who, having entered to aid him in the execution of the warrant, is detained therein, or when necessary for his own liberation.

"SEC. 10. The judge or commissioner must insert a direction in the warrant that it be served in the daytime, unless the affidavits are positive that the property is on the person or in the place to be searched, in which case he may insert a direction that it be served at any time of the day or night.

"SEC. 11. A search warrant must be executed and returned to the judge or commissioner who issued it within 10 days after its date; after the expiration of this time the warrant, unless executed, is void.

"SEC. 12. When the officer takes property under the warrant, he must give a copy of the warrant together with a receipt for the property taken (specifying it in detail) to the person from whom it was taken by him, or in whose possession it was found; or, in the absence of any person, he must leave it in the place where he found the property.

"SEC. 13. The officer must forthwith return the warrant to the judge or commissioner and deliver to him a written inventory of the property taken, made publicly or in the presence of the person from whose possession it was taken, and of the applicant for the warrant, if they are present, verified by the affidavit of the officer at the foot of the inventory and taken before the judge or commissioner at the time, to the following effect: 'I, R. S., the officer by whom this warrant was executed, do swear that the above inventory contains a true and detailed account of all the property taken by me on the warrant.'

"SEC. 14. The judge or commissioner must thereupon, if required, deliver a copy of the inventory to the person from whose possession the property was taken and to the applicant for the warrant.

"SEC. 15. If the grounds on which the warrant was issued be controverted, the judge or commissioner must proceed to take testimony in relation thereto, and the testimony of each witness must be reduced to writing and subscribed by each witness.

"SEC. 16. If it appears that the property or paper taken is not the same as that described in the warrant or that there is no probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, the judge or commissioner must cause it to be restored to the person from whom it was taken; but if it appears that the property or paper taken is the same as that described in the warrant and that there is probable cause for believing the existence of the grounds on which the warrant was issued, then the judge or commissioner shall order the same retained in the custody of the person seizing it or to be otherwise disposed of according to law.

"SEC. 17. The judge or commissioner must annex the affidavits, search warrant, return, inventory, and evidence, and if he has not power to inquire into the offense in respect to which the warrant was issued he must at once file the same, together with a copy of the record of his proceedings, with the clerk of the court having power to so inquire.

"SEC. 18. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any such officer or person in serving or attempting to serve or execute any such search warrant, or shall assault, beat, or wound any such officer or person, knowing him to be an officer or person so authorized, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years.

"SEC. 19. Sections 125 and 126 of the Criminal Code of the United States shall apply to and embrace all persons making oath or affirmation or procuring the same under the provisions of this title, and such persons shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of said sections.

"SEC. 20. A person who maliciously and without probable cause procures a search warrant to be issued and executed shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 21. An officer who in executing a search warrant willfully exceeds his authority, or exceeds it with unnecessary severity, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year.

"SEC. 22. Whoever, in aid of any foreign government, shall knowingly and willfully have possession of or control over any property or papers designed or intended for use or which is used as a means of violating any penal statute, or any of the rights or obligations of the United States under any treaty or the law of nations, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 23. Nothing contained in this title shall be held to repeal or impair any existing provisions of law regulating search and the issue of search warrants.

"TITLE XII.

Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in submitting the motion I intend to make I trust no Senator will feel that it is an imposition upon the time or the business of the Senate or that its purpose implies any motive of disloyalty to the flag of our country. On the contrary, it is intended as a tribute to the patriotism of the Confederate veteran and his son, who stand ready and willing to offer their lives and their means for the perpetuation of the Union which they so desperately and at such great sacrifice attempted to dissolve. I take the liberty of offering this motion since I am the only remaining Senator who served four full years as a Confederate soldier.

The local post of the Grand Army of the Republic and the civic organizations of the city of Washington have extended the Confederate veterans a most generous and pressing invitation to hold their twenty-seventh annual reunion in the Capital City of the Nation, and in the same generous and gracious spirit the invitation was accepted. To-day the shattered remnants of the armies of Lee and Jackson, Johnston and Bragg, and of the navies of the Confederacy, who are physically and financially able, are in Washington and on Thursday will march with their sons down Pennsylvania Avenue in review before the President of the United States. Think, Senators, of the significance of a spectacle like this! A little more than half a century ago these same men in arms were hammering at the gates of Washington in an effort to sever their relations with the National Government. Thursday, marching with broken body and faltering step, on a mission of peace and love, not of hatred and bloodshed, but in a spirit of resolute reconciliation and absolute loyalty to our flag, they will voice in vibrant tones to all the world an indissoluble Union of the United States. I am grateful that God has spared me to see this day, when my old comrades in arms of the Confederacy are here in the Capital of that Nation which for four years they struggled desperately to destroy but which none in all this great Republic are now more anxious to preserve.

For four years I marched and fought under the Stars and Bars. Five immediate members of my family are now enlisted under the Stars and Stripes, a son, two grandsons, and two nephews. They will even up our records.

Now, Mr. President, as a mark of honor and respect to the Confederate veterans assembled in reunion in the city of Washington, the Capital of the United States of America, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Friday, June 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.
